is said to have been occupied by Ivor Bâch, a native lord of Upper Senghenydd, who from this place is supposed to have made a descent upon Cardiff castle, and to have taken Robert Earl of Gloucester and his lady prisoners, and detained them in confinement till they consented to observe the ancient customs of the country, and restore the laws of Hywel Dda. In the time of Leland this place does not appear to have been regarded as possessing any importance: that writer, having noticed Morlais castle, makes no further mention of Merthyr than as the parish through which "Morlais riveret goith to the ripe of Tave:" this fortress was demolished by the parliamentary forces in the middle of the seventeenth century. The first congregation of dissenters known to have assembled in Wales was formed at this place, about the year 1620, when Vavasour Powel, celebrated in the annals of nonconformity, while preaching to this congregation, was apprehended and committed to Cardiff gaol. According to a curious journal kept by the incumbent of the parish at that time, the dissenters were not contented with the liberty of paying only what they pleased for tithes, but were in the habit of entering the parish church in a body, during the performance of divine service, and forcibly wresting the Book of Common Prayer from the hands of the officiating minister; and when he ascended the pulpit to preach, a teacher of their own sect would climb up into one of the yew trees in the churchyard, and commence an address to his followers. In June 1831, serious dissensions arose between the workmen and the proprietors of the several mines in this parish, which were attended with consequences much to be regretted. The workmen having assembled in a tumultuous manner, the riot act was read by the police magistrate of the district, and the yeomanry and military, together with a company of the militia, which was then at Cardiff, advanced to the spot, and at length succeeded in restoring order, though unhappily not without the loss of several lives on the side of the workmen, and some of the military being wounded. Major Falls, who commanded the regular forces, was severely wounded at the beginning of the conflict, and the command of the military devolved upon Lieutenant-Colonel Morgan, of the Glamorganshire militia, whose coolness, intrepidity, and judgment were subsequently eulogised by the lord-lieutenant of the county, in his reply to an address of the gentry of Glamorganshire on the occasion.

The town is situated in a mountainous district near the extremity of the Yale of Tâf, and on the river of that name, by which it is partly separated from the county of Brecknock: it is very irregularly built, consisting of assemblages of huts, cottages, and houses, confusedly mixed together, without any regard to order or uniformity of style or arrangement, and occupying both banks of the river, which is crossed by two bridges, but the principal portion of the town is on the eastern bank. Some little improvement has been made, within the last few years, by the construction of a street forming the principal thoroughfare, in which are some shops and houses of more modern character. A mechanics' institute was established in 1829, at Dowlais, in which, since the philosophical society at Coedycummer has been discontinued, weekly lectures are delivered on general subjects, but chiefly on mineralogy and metallurgy: there is also a society for the discussion, in the Welsh language, of subjects connected with the history and literature of Wales. A theatre, of very inferior character as a building, and now almost concealed by small houses, by which it is surrounded, was formerly opened by a respectable itinerant company; and races were formerly held on Twyn y Waun: but, from the depressed state of the iron trade within the last few years, both these sources of amusement have been discontinued. Cyvarthva Castle and Park form a fine object above the town; and Pen y darren House, with its gardens, is equally interesting at the other extremity. But the general aspect of the vicinity is unprepossessing, the face of nature being disfigured by towering heaps of scoria from the iron mines, which are undergoing continued increase, thus precluding the growth of vegetation upon them, and exhibiting, from their nakedness, in combination with the dense columns of black smoke incessantly emitted from the works, a repulsive appearance of rudeness and gloomy sterility. In the lower part of the parish, however, and in other detached portions, are still several well-wooded and extensive plantations. The vale of the Taf, at the distance of some miles below the town, is narrow and bounded by steep hills, but expands gradually towards the part on which the town is principally built. The parish extends about ten miles from north to south: at the northern extremity its breadth is about five miles, but towards the south it contracts to a breadth of less than one mile.

The mineral treasures of this district, though not fully explored, or rendered so extensively available as they have been since the middle of the last century, were not altogether unappreciated or neglected previously to that period, as is evident from the great heaps of scoria, and other remains which are frequently turned up by the plough in the adjacent lands. From the simple apparatus employed in the mining operations prior to that period it is evident that the process must have been tedious and the produce inconsiderable; and it appears from tradition that the ore was smelted in small blomerics blown by bellows similar to those used in the common forges of smiths. About one hundred and sixty years since, some small improvement was introduced into these operations; and works upon a more enlarged scale were constructed on the site on which the Pen y darren works have been subsequently established, in which the bellows were worked by a water wheel, which is said to have been one of the earliest instances of the application of water to this purpose known in the island. Charcoal was used in calcining the ore, instead of coke, the method of preparing which from mineral coal being at that time unknown; and the wood for the supply of these works is said to have been obtained from a common contiguous to the town, called Coedycymmer. To the general use of charcoal for this purpose may be attributed the great want of timber on the districts adjoining the town, which are known to have been in former times richly and extensively wooded. The present extent and importance of the iron and coal works, and the consequent enlargement of the town and the amazing increase in the amount of its population, are to be primarily attributed to Mr. Anthony Bacon, subsequently member of parliament for the borough of Aylesbury, who, about the middle of the last century, in conjunction with some other gentlemen, obtained a lease for ninety-nine years, at £200 per annum, of a mineral tract in this district, abounding with coal and iron-ore, and extending about eight miles in length and four in width. Mr. Bacon soon afterwards erected a furnace and works at Cyvarthva, for smelting the ore, and subsequently a forge for the manufacture of bar iron. The Dowlais and Plymouth works were successively established by different companies; but they were not carried on to any great extent, or with any considerable benefit to the proprietors. Soon after the commencement of the American war, Mr. Bacon entered into a contract with government for supplying the different arsenals with cannon, and erected at Cyvarthva a foundry, and works for the boring of cannon, which in 1782 he let on lease to Mr. S. Homfray, who contracted with him for all the iron produced at Cyvarthva, at £4. 10. per ton long weight, and for as much coal as he should require, at the rate of four shillings per ton. Mr. Homfray, having entered into this contract for a term of fifty years, completed his establishment, and introduced a number of the best workmen from England; he made great improvements in the machinery for boring cannon, and also built some forges for manufacturing bar iron; but, in consequence of some misunderstanding with Mr. Bacon, he in a very short time disposed of his portion of the Cyvarthva works to Mr. Tanner of Monmouth, who afterwards sold it to Mr. Richard Crawshaw, an iron-master from London. After his retirement from the works at Cyvarthva, Mr. Homfray, in company with some other gentlemen, established the Pen y darren iron-works, in 1784, which he conducted with very great success; and in 1793 he discovered a method of producing what is here called Finers' Metal, a discovery of the highest value and importance in the manufacture of iron, as this valuable ingredient not only increases the quantity, but also improves the quality of the iron. After superintending the Pen y darren works for some time with considerable success, Mr. Homfray projected the construction of a canal from the Cyvarthva works at Merthyr-Tydvil to Cardiff, over a tract of country singularly difficult, from the hilly nature of the ground; but from some misunderstanding which arose between the managers and the proprietors, he finally withdrew from the concern, the superintendence of which devolved upon Mr. Richard Crawshaw, and has proved of incalculable benefit to the county at large, and to the shareholders in particular. On the death of Mr. Anthony Bacon, his various works were let on lease to different gentlemen; those at Cyvarthva were taken by Mr. Richard Crawshaw, who had previously held that portion of them which were originally leased to Mr. Homfray; the works at Hîrwaun, by Mr. Glover, and the Plymouth works by Mr. Hill. The Cyvarthva works, under the superintendence of Mr. Crawshaw, who had a great amount of capital at his command, rapidly increased in extent and improvement; and in the year 1800 that gentleman constructed an overshot water wheel of cast iron, fifty feet in diameter, at an expense of £4000, by the power of which the operations were greatly accelerated. This wheel was set in motion by a stream of water brought from a considerable distance by an aqueduct eighty feet above the bed of the river; but, after being used for a considerable time with great effect, it was at length superseded by two steam-engines, one of eighty and the other of seventy horse power.

The principal establishments in the iron trade are, the Cyvarthva works, belonging to Messrs. Crawshay and Sons; Dowlais, belonging to Messrs. Guest, Lewis, and Co.; the Plymouth works, to Messrs. Hill; and the Pen y darren, to Messrs. Thompson and Forman. In the year 1830, the two first had each nine furnaces in blast, exclusively of others out of work or under repair; the third had five furnaces in operation, and the fourth had four; making a total of twenty-seven furnaces in blast. The average quantity of pig iron produced from each furnace per annum is two thousand five hundred tons. In the same year the quantity of iron manufactured at these works collectively was sixty-six thousand five hundred tons, in the making of which were consumed five hundred thousand tons of coal, two hundred and eighty thousand tons of iron-stone, and more than one hundred thousand tons of limestone; and the number of men employed, including those in the mines and quarries connected with them, was, at Cyvarthva, three thousand; at Dowlais, three thousand five hundred; at the Plymouth works, one thousand five hundred; and in the Pen y darren works, one thousand; making a total of nine thousand persons. The stratum of coal found is of excellent quality for smelting the ore, and is accompanied with parallel veins of argillaceous iron-ore, which penetrate the mountains to a great depth, and yield upon an average about thirty-five parts of metal out of a hundred: the mines are worked by levels. The limestone is not so strong as that found in some parts of England; but it varies in quality, and in colour from a deep black to a richly variegated marble of all colours. Stone of excellent quality for millstones is also found in abundance in the mountains in the neighbourhood. The home trade of this place, consisting chiefly of the importation of shop goods and manufactured articles for the supply of this populous district, is also very considerable; these are brought to the town by the canal from Cardiff, chiefly from Bristol. The canal from Merthyr-Tydvil to Cardiff, better known by the name of the Glamorganshire canal, was projected originally by Mr. Homfray, while connected with the Pen y darren iron-works, as related above, and was commenced under an act of the 30th of George III., and completed under another act of the 36th of the same reign, in 1796. It begins at the Cyvarthva iron-works, is carried over the river Tâf by an aqueduct, and over a line of country singularly difficult from the hilly nature of the ground, and terminates at Cardiff, a distance of twenty-five miles, having in its whole course a total fall of six hundred and eleven feet. About two miles and a half from the town, opposite to Troed y rhiw mill, is a powerful steam-engine, constructed by Messrs. Bolton and Watt, for raising water from the river Tâf, for the supply of the canal. There are several tram-roads from the iron-works, mines, and collieries in this rich mineral district. The Merthyr-Tydvil rail-road takes a course parallel with the canal from Merthyr to the aqueduct, but on the opposite side of the river, a distance of about ten miles, by which means any interruption to the conveyance of the mineral produce during dry seasons, when the canal is scantily supplied with water, is obviated by forwarding it on the rail-road, in waggons constructed for the purpose. The value of land has increased in a ratio corresponding to the improvement of this place in commercial and manufacturing importance. One farm in the neighbourhood, which in the year 1775, the time when the first furnace was erected, was let at £2. 10. per annum, now produces a rental of £50; and another, which at the same time was let for £5 per annum, has since been advanced to £100 per annum. The increase in population has been also equally progressive: the return according to the census of 1801 was seven thousand seven hundred and five; in 1811, eleven thousand one hundred and four; in 1821, seventeen thousand four hundred and four; and in 1831, twenty-two thousand and eighty-three. Since this last return, a petition addressed to parliament for an extension of the representative franchise to this place states upon oath the number of inhabitants to be twenty-six thousand five hundred and fifty. The market days are Wednesday and Friday; and there are three market-places. A fair for cattle is held annually on May 14th; and at a place called Twyn y Waun, on a neighbouring hill within the limits of the parish, are fairs on the first Monday in July, and the first Monday in August, also for cattle. Merthyr-Tydvil has, with the parish of Aberdare, and the village of Coedycummer, in the adjoining parish of Vainor, county of Brecknock, been constituted a borough by the late act for amending the representation of the people, with the privilege of returning one member to parliament: the right of voting is vested in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of at least ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act demands: the number of such tenements within the limits of the borough, which are correctly detailed in the Appendix to this work, is about eight hundred and thirty in Merthyr-Tydvil and Coedycummer, and one hundred and thirty-five in Aberdare: the returning officer is to be annually appointed by the high sheriff for the county. It has also been made a polling-place in the election of knights for the shire. The parish, together with the parishes of Aberdare and Gellygaer, is under the superintendence of a stipendiary police magistrate, appointed by act of parliament of the 10th of George IV., with a salary of £600 per annum, one-half of which is, under the provisions of that act, levied on the several furnaces in the three parishes, and the other half by a rate on the inhabitants of the parish of Merthyr-Tydvil alone: the present magistrate, I. Bruce Bruce, Esq., of Dyffryn, in the parish of Aberdare, was appointed to this office in 1829. The petty sessions for the upper division of the hundred of Caerphilly are held in the town. A court of requests for the recovery of debts not exceeding £5, under an act obtained in the 49th of George III., is held in the town, on the second Thursday in every month, before an unlimited number of commissioners, of whom, in giving judgment, the senior commissioner present has the casting vote. Its jurisdiction extends over the parishes of Aberdare, Gellygaer, Llanwonno, Merthyr-Tydvil, and Ystrad-yvodog, in the county of Glamorgan; the parishes of Llangynider, Penderin, and Vainor, in the county of Brecknock; and the parish of Bedwelty, in the county of Monmouth.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £20. 5. 7½, and in the patronage of the Marquis of Bute. It is in contemplation, on the death of the present rector, to subdivide this extensive parish into parochial districts, which are already marked out for that purpose, and of which Dowlais will be one. The church, dedicated to St. Tydvil, and entirely rebuilt within the last few years, is a spacious structure, in the later style of English architecture, with a low tower: it has recently received three hundred and forty-four additional sittings, of which number, two hundred and eighty-two are free, in consideration of which, the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels granted £150 towards defraying the expense. At Dowlais there is a church, erected by the proprietors of the Dowlais iron-works, at an expense of £3000: it is a neat and appropriate edifice, containing six hundred and fifty sittings, of which one-half are free: the living is a rectory not in charge, also in the patronage of the Marquis of Bute. There are three places of worship for Particular Baptists, and one for General Baptists, three for Independents, two for Wesleyan Methodists, and one each for Calvinistic Methodists and Unitarians. A National school is supported in the town by subscription: the building is capable of accommodating four hundred children; at present one hundred and fifty boys and eighty girls receive gratuitous instruction. John William, in 1735, bequeathed a rent-charge of £4, one-half of which he appropriated to the teaching of poor children of dissenters to read Welsh, and the remainder to the poor of the dissenting congregation at Merthyr. The only vestiges of antiquity in this parish, worthy of notice, are the remains of Morlais castle, occupying the highest point of a lofty hill surrounded by a desolate tract of country now abounding with rabbits. The ruins of this ancient fortress, though inconsiderable, convey some idea of its original strength: the walls enclosed a pentagonal area of no great extent. The principal apartment of the castle, though almost buried in the ruins of the other parts of the building, is yet remaining: it is a circular room of about thirty feet in diameter, with a vaulted roof supported on a single central pillar; the inner wall is divided into twelve arched compartments, in which were originally windows: the entrance into this apartment is by a narrow gallery or passage, now so obstructed by the ruins of the walls as to be almost inaccessible. Immediately below the ruins of the castle, the lesser Tâf, impetuously rushing through its rugged bed to its confluence with the greater river of that name, is crossed by a bridge of picturesque appearance, called "Pont Sarn," thrown over a chasm in the limestone rock, thirty feet in width, the sides of which are fringed with underwood, and at the base are fragments of rock obstructing the channel of the river, which roars beneath. At a short distance above Pont Sarn is a hollow in the rock, called Dryford Cavern, into which a spring falls from above, and in times of flood, overflowing the brink, forms a cascade of interesting and romantic appearance. Several chalybeate springs flow from the mountains in various parts of the parish. At a place called Gethin, between the river Tâf and the canal, are the remains of a small but very ancient furnace; and about two miles lower down, between Gethin and the engine for supplying the canal, are the ruins of a similar furnace, near which, in the river, are the oak stakes which anciently formed a weir, called Wattle Weir; but of the origin or history of these works nothing has been recorded even by tradition. Gwilym Tew, an eminent Welsh poet, is said to have been a native of Tavedale, in the vicinity of this town. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of this extensive parish, for a few years preceding March 1829, amounted to £2896. 2.: at present (1832) it is nearly £6000.

MEVENNYDD (MEVENYDD), a township in the parish of LLANRHÏSTID, lower division of the hundred of LLAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 10½ miles (S.) from Aberystwith, containing 740 inhabitants. There are some respectable residences in this township, one of which is Mabus, a pleasant seat of the Lloyds, situated on an eminence above the small river Gwyre. The river Aëron has its source here, in a small lake called Llŷnaedwen.

MEYLLTYRN (MYLLTEYRN, or MELLTEYRN), a parish partly in the hundred of GAFLOGION, and partly in that of COMMITMAEN, Lleyn division of the county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 9 miles (W. by S.) from Pwllheli, containing 268 inhabitants. This parish is divided by the small river Rhŷdlâs into two nearly equal parts, of which the eastern division is in the hundred of Gaflogion, and the western in that of Commitmaen: it is separated from the parish of Bottwnog by the river Avon Trevaes, and from that of Brŷncroes by the river Avon Bôdnithoedd. The village is small, but is pleasantly situated on a wide plain; the lands in the vicinity are fertile, and the inhabitants are wholly employed in agriculture, except during the season of the herring fishery, which for the time affords employment to the whole population. At Sarn, a village in this parish, an annual fair for cattle and horses is held on the 27th of June. The living is a discharged rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Bottwnog annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £5. 15., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Peter ad Vincula, is a small edifice in good repair: in the churchyard is an ancient upright stone of large dimensions, without either sculpture or inscription. There is a place of worship in the parish for Calvinistic Methodists. Dr. Rowland bequeathed land for the maintenance of one poor widower of this parish in the almshouse at Bangor; and there are some other charitable bequests for the relief of the poor. Henry Rowland, afterwards Bishop of Bangor, and the munificent founder of the grammar school at Bottwnog, was born in this parish, in 1551, at a small farm-house near the church, which is still remaining: he died in 1616, and by his will ordered that the school should be built either in this his native village, or in the adjoining village of Bottwnog. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £70. 5.

MIAWST, a joint hamlet with Trech Gwinnon, in the parish of LLANARTHNEY, higher division of the hundred of ISCENNEN, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $9\frac{1}{2}$  miles (E. by S.) from Carmarthen. The population is included in the return for the parish. It occupies a vale near the source of the Gwendraeth Vâch river, where the population is thinly scattered, and exclusively employed in agriculture.

MICHAEL-CHURCH, a parish in the hundred of PAINSCASTLE, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. W.) from Kington, containing 159 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church, is situated at the south-eastern extremity of the county, bordering upon Herefordshire, and is sometimes called Michael-Church upon Arrow, from its position on the banks of that river: it extends about four miles in length and three miles in breadth, and comprises some good tracts of arable and pasture land, which are enclosed and in a tolerable state of cultivation. The surrounding scenery, especially on the eastern and south-eastern sides of the parish, is agreeably diversified; and the views over the adjacent country, from Huntingdon hill, abound with variety and interest. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Kington, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is not remarkable for any architectural details of importance. This parish has the privilege of sending poor children to be gratuitously instructed in the free grammar school of Kington, in the county of Hereford. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £119.

MICHAELSTON LE PIT, a parish in the hundred of DINAS-POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. W. by W.) from Cardiff, containing 105 inhabitants. Lias and mountain limestone, together with lead-ore, are found in this small parish, which is exclusively agricultural, and presents some fine well-wooded enclosures. Courtyrala, an Italian villa, the seat of T. B. Rous, Esq., is pleasantly situated above a stream artificially widened and improved, over which a rustic bridge has been formed, amid scenery of the most romantic and picturesque character: the grounds are disposed with great taste, and disclose, at various points of view, the most admired scenes of the adjacent country. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £4. 10.  $7\frac{1}{2}$ ., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of T. B. Rous, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. A school for the education of children of both sexes is supported by the family of Rous. On the summit of a hill, in this parish, are vestiges of an earthwork, supposed to be of Roman construction. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £41. 3.

MICHAELSTON super AVON, a parish, comprising the Upper and Lower divisions, which separately maintain their own poor, in the hundred of NEATH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $6\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. S. E.) from Neath, and containing 1050 inhabitants, of which number, 793 are in the Lower division. The name of this parish is derived from the dedication of its church to St. Michael, and its distinguishing adjunct from its situation on the river Avon, which falls into Aberavon bay in the Bristol channel. The parish, which is pleasantly situated in the Vale of Avon, within a mile and a quarter of the town of Aberavon, through which passes the turnpike road from Cardiff to Swansea, comprises a large tract of country, of which nearly one-half is mountainous, and the remainder good arable and pasture land: the soil is tolerably fertile, and the inhabitants of the Upper hamlet are altogether employed in agriculture. The village, which is in the Lower hamlet, is pleasantly situated in a sequestered part of the vale, which, till within the last few years, was rarely visited by strangers: it formerly consisted only of a few solitary cottages thinly scattered on the hills, but the mineral wealth with which the mountainous district of the parish abounds has effected an important change, and the establishment of various works has completely transformed it into a scene of cheerful activity, the population having increased above sixty per cent. since the census of 1821. Numerous comfortable cottages have been built for the accommodation of the workmen, a handsome modern residence for the proprietor of the works, and a beautiful cottage for the minister of the parish, who was previously non-resident. The parish abounds with iron-ore and coal, a large vein of the latter, from ten to twelve yards in depth, having been recently discovered. In the coal are often found vegetable impressions of fern and reeds; and a fine specimen of what is conjectured to be an extinct species of the palm, or fern tree, has been recently found: it is part of the trunk of the tree, about two feet and three-quarters in length, and one foot and a half in diameter, and consists of what geologists call carboniferous sandstone; the higher and lower parts of the tree are still in the ground. The works established at Cwm Bychan are chiefly for the manufacture of pyroligneous acid, sugar of lead, and tin plates, and afford employment to about four hundred men. Fire clay is also found in the parish in great abundance and of good quality. A rail-road from the works communicates with the shipping-place at Taibâch, near the mouth of the river Avon; and another extends from the coal-works along the left bank of that river, where vessels can lie in safety while waiting for their freight. A portion of the lower division of the parish is included within the new boundaries of the contributory borough of Aberavon. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Mr. Coke, to whom belong the tithes of the Higher hamlet: those of the Lower are the property of the Earl of Jersey. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, and pleasantly situated on the western bank of the river Avon, is a small edifice of great antiquity, in a very dilapidated condition, and contains an ancient altar-tomb, with an inscription which is now nearly obliterated. There are two places of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. A school-room has been built by the proprietors of the works in this parish, for the instruction of the children employed in them, the school being supported chiefly by monthly contributions from their parents. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor, during the few years immediately preceding March 1829, amounted to £54, of which sum, £20 was formerly assessed on the Lower hamlet, but its proportion is much larger now, in consequence of the improvements in this division of the parish.

MICHAELSTON super ELY, a parish in the hundred of DINAS-POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W.) from Cardiff, containing 60 inhabitants. This small parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Michael, and its distinguishing appellation from its situation on the southern bank of the river Ely, which separates it from the parish of St. Fagan, is beautifully situated in the south-eastern part of the county, and comprises a moderate portion of rich arable and pasture land, which is in a good state of cultivation. It was formerly distinguished for a castle erected here, probably by some of the Norman invaders of the principality, but of which little of the history has been preserved, and scarcely the ruins are at present distinguishable. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied, and the distant views extend over a fertile and highly cultivated tract of country. The living is a discharged rectory, with the rectory of St. Bride's super Ely consolidated, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £8. 6. 8., and in the patronage of Llewellyn Trehearne, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is not remarkable for any architectural details. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £12. 4.

MICHAELSTON (UPPER), a hamlet in the parish of MICHAELSTON SUPER AVON, hundred of NEATH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. E. by S.) from Neath, containing 257 inhabitants. Prior to the introduction of mineral and chemical works into the Lower hamlet, this formed the more considerable portion of the parish, and paid two-thirds of the poor's rate: the average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £34.

MIDDLETON, a township in that part of the parish of ALBERBURY which is in the lower division of the hundred of CAWRSE, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (E. by S.) from Welshpool, containing 100 inhabitants.

MILFORD, a newly created borough, sea-port, and market town, in the parish of STREYNTON, hundred of RHÔS, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (N. W.) from Pembroke, 8 (S. S. W.) from Haverfordwest, and 256 (W.) from London: the population is returned with the parish. This town, which is celebrated for the spacious and commodious haven to which it gives name, is said to have derived its appellation from a stream which turned a mill anciently belonging to a priory, about a mile from the present town, and over which there was a ford, prior to the erection of a bridge at this place. It was in the famous haven of Milford that Henry II. embarked with the troops which he had assembled for the conquest of Ireland; and here also he landed, on his return from that expedition. In the reign of Henry IV., an army of twelve thousand men, which had been sent from France to the assistance of Owain Glyndwr, in his insurrection against the authority of that monarch, landed at this place, from which they marched to the siege of Haverfordwest, and afterwards to that of Carmarthen. The Earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII., attended by a small body of French retainers, ill disciplined and scantily provided for the great design he had undertaken, also landed in this haven, where he was received by Rhÿs ab Thomas, with a numerous train of his dependents and followers, whose warlike appearance encouraged him at once to proceed on his arduous enterprise. On this occasion it is said that Rhÿs, who had previously, in his assurances of loyalty to Richard, declared that any person ill affected to the state, daring to land in those parts of Wales where he had any employment under the king, "must resolve to make his entrance and irruption over his belly," laid himself on his back on the ground, that the earl, on landing, might pass over him: a tradition still popular in the neighbourhood states that Rhÿs, in the evasive redemption of his pledge, remained under a small bridge, while the earl passed over it. Immediately after his landing, Richmond, having despatched orders to his partisans in other parts of the country, to join him with their forces at Shrewsbury, set forward upon his march, forming his small army into two divisions, one of which he commanded himself, taking his route through Cardiganshire, and the other he placed under the conduct of Rhÿs, who, passing through Carmarthenshire, was to collect his followers on his march, and to rejoin the earl at Shrewsbury. In the reign of Henry VIII., although the present town of Milford was not then in existence, the port of Llanelly, in Carmarthenshire, was esteemed a creek to the harbour; and in the reign of Elizabeth, when the country was threatened with the Spanish invasion, an engineer named Ivy was sent hither, to survey the haven, and to report on the means necessary to be adopted for its defence against the enemy; but his conduct gave so much dissatisfaction to the inhabitants of this part of the coast, that a spirited memorial was drawn up, signed by the Bishop of St. David's and the principal gentlemen and magistrates of the county, and presented to the leading members of the Privy Council. In this memorial they set forth the great importance to "her Majesty and the realm" of properly and effectually fortifying the haven of Milford, and entreat that some engineer of experience should be sent down for that purpose. In consequence either of this remonstrance, or of Mr. Ivy's report of the means necessary for the defence of the place, orders were issued for the construction of two forts near the entrance of the haven, which were begun in situations very ill chosen for the purpose, but were never finished; and their remains, called respectively the Dale and Nangle blockhouses, are still visible. About the commencement of the American war, it was resolved by government to form a dock-yard at Nayland, on the northern shore of the haven, and a little to the east of the present town; and some land in the vicinity was purchased for the erection of forts and batteries for its defence; but, after two ships had been built there by contract, viz., the Milford frigate, and the Prince of Wales of seventy-four guns, and when one of the fortifications had been constructed to a considerable extent, the design was abandoned, after nearly £20,000 had been expended. The late Admiral Lord Nelson, who, after the battle of the Nile, visited this place in company with the late Sir William Hamilton, then proprietor of it, regarded Milford Haven as the finest and most extensive harbour in the known world, capable of floating more than the whole navy of England within its limits in perfect safety. George IV., on his return from Dublin in 1821, encountering a gale of wind near the Land's End, the royal squadron twice entered this haven; and his Majesty, having landed at Milford, ultimately proceeded by land to London. In commemoration of this event a tablet, about six feet in height, ornamented in the centre with a large shell, and with wreaths of flowers down the sides, was placed at the end of a public building near Milford Quay, by the Hon. Robert Fulke Greville, on which is engraved a long inscription detailing the circumstances of that occurrence.

The present town is of very recent origin, and owes its rise and importance to the Hon. Mr. Greville, nephew of the late Sir William Hamilton, and subsequently, after the death of his uncle, proprietor of the estate. This gentleman, during the lifetime of Sir William, perceiving the advantages which might be derived from the situation of the property, procured an act of parliament in 1790, enabling Sir William Hamilton, his heirs and assigns, to make docks, construct quays, establish markets, with roads and avenues to the port, to regulate the police, and to make this place a station for conveying the mails to Waterford, which previously had been compelled to stop at Haverfordwest, eight miles distant from the place of shipping. To this arrangement may be attributed the origin of the town, which it was resolved to build opposite to the finest anchorage in that part of the haven called the Man of War Roads. The first building erected on this site was a large and commodious inn, for the accommodation of the passengers by the mail coaches and packets; and the ground plan having been regularly laid out, the allotments were eagerly taken and built upon, and a flourishing town soon arose. The earliest settlers in the new town were some families from the island of Nantucket, on the coast of North America, of whom the Starbucks first, and afterwards the family of Rotch, came by invitation of government to establish the South Sea Whale fishery at this port, which trade was carried on successfully for some years, but was afterwards entirely discontinued. The increasing population soon caused the establishment of a market, for which a good market-house has been built, and which is well and cheaply supplied for the inhabitants and the shipping, this having been formerly a station for men of war; and the accession to the trade of the place procured, in a short time, the erection of a custom-house, in 1823, to which that of Pembroke became subordinate. A very great addition to the prosperity and importance of the town was made by carrying into effect Lord Spencer's plan for establishing a royal dock-yard at this port, which took place about the commencement of the present century, when a frigate of forty guns, and a sloop of thirty, were built here, and proved to be the best ships of their respective classes in the service. In 1809, the Milford of seventy-four guns was launched here; and in consequence of the design of government to fix the new dock-yard and naval arsenal at this place, a petition was presented to the House of Commons, in 1813, for leave to bring in a bill for the improvement of the town, by building a bridge across one of the inlets from the haven to the village of Haking, to be constructed in such a manner as to convert the inlet into a floating dock of sixty acres. Under these favourable circumstances the town, which had already become considerable in its extent and population, promised greatly to increase in importance; but its further progress was arrested by the removal of the royal dock-yard and arsenal to Paterchurch, or Pembroke Dock, which took place in 1814. It has still, however, retained its distinction as the station for the post-office packets to Waterford, from which it has derived a considerable degree of prosperity; but it is at present in contemplation to remove this establishment also to a place called Hobbs Point, near Pembroke Dock, where a handsome pier is now being built with that view.

The town of Milford is beautifully situated, five or six miles from the mouth of the haven, on a point of land sloping down to the water, by which it is almost surrounded, being bounded on the east by Prix Pill, on the west by Priory Pill, and on the south by the main haven, which here expands into a spacious reach, having the appearance of a large inland lake, enclosed by rocky shores presenting rich and highly varied scenery. The present town, elevated upwards of sixty feet above the level of the sea, consists of three parallel streets, intersected at right angles by others leading down to the haven: the lower street contains only one row of houses, overlooking the water, and having in front a fine terrace, at one extremity of which stands the principal hotel, a spacious and handsome pile of building, affording every accommodation for passengers to and from Waterford. The houses, which are for the most part built of stone procured on the spot, are regularly disposed, and many of them are of very handsome design. The approach to the town from the sea is defended by two batteries, mounting each seven guns, and erected on the opposite shores of the haven; and between the adjacent villages of Haking and Hubberstone there is an observatory, which, however, having never been finished, is now going to decay. The air is remarkably salubrious, and the surrounding scenery abounds with variety and beauty, and in some places is highly picturesque. Milford Haven is one of the most extensive and secure harbours in the kingdom, or perhaps in the world: it is formed by the junction of the rivers called the Eastern and Western Cleddy, from the mouths of which it extends nearly ten miles in length, being from one to two miles in breadth, and has five bays, ten creeks, and thirteen roadsteads; the whole affording good anchorage and safe shelter for ships of the greatest burden, which, from the strength and depth of the tides, can put to sea in any winds with more expedition than from any large harbour on the coast of Britain: its total navigable length, from its mouth up the main haven and the Western Cleddy to Haverfordwest, is twenty-one miles; from its mouth, ascending the haven and the Eastern Cleddy, to Canaston bridge, about twenty miles. It has been stated by a naval officer once resident at this place to be capable of receiving, at the same time, one thousand ships of the line, one thousand fifty gun ships, one thousand frigates, one thousand sloops of war, and one thousand transports, without the least danger of their being in each other's way; and that one hundred sail of the line might be brought to act simultaneously against any number of ships that might attempt to enter the harbour.

The trade and present importance of the town arise from its being a great resort of shipping, not only on account of the custom-house, but also of the packet and quarantine establishments, and the convenience of its situation as a port for vessels in distress and under circumstances of peculiar destination. The principal business is that of ship-building, which, since the removal of the royal dock-yard, is still carried on upon a less extensive scale: there are several yards for the repairing of vessels, in which also vessels of upwards of one hundred tons' burden are built. Coal for the supply of the post-office steam-packets is brought from Scotland; American timber is imported for ship-building and domestic uses, and also various articles of Baltic produce, but upon a small scale. The principal exports are, stone coal, for drying malt, of which great quantities are shipped for London and different ports on the Bristol and English channels, and limestone and culm, which are sent coastwise. A large oyster fishery is carried on for the supply of distant markets, the oysters of this coast being esteemed unrivalled in quality. The number of vessels belonging to the port, according to the official returns of 1831, is one hundred and sixteen, of the aggregate burden of eight thousand one hundred and four tons. The post-office steam-packets sail daily to Waterford, and daily return, conveying the Irish mail: they are commodiously fitted up for the reception of passengers. The jurisdiction of the port extends over the whole haven, and along the entire coast from near Laugharne, in Carmarthenshire, to St. David's Head: it is under the control of a Lord High Admiral and a Vice Admiral of the port, a harbour-master, a superintendent of quarantine, and a collector of the customs: an agent for the post-office packets, and an agent for Lloyd's, who is likewise a consul for foreign nations, are also resident in the town. Some good quays have been constructed, and there are extensive warehouses for bonding stores, and two bonding yards for timber. The custom-house is a neat and substantial building, commodiously situated, and well adapted to its purpose. A public brewery is conducted upon an extensive scale; and a considerable trade is carried on in ship-chandlery and other articles necessary for the supply of the shipping. The market days are Tuesday and Saturday, and the markets, which are abundantly supplied and numerous attended, are held in a convenient and sheltered area for the purpose. The lord of the manor holds courts leet, at which constables and other officers are appointed. By the recent act of parliament for amending the representation, Milford has been made a contributory borough to Pembroke in returning one member to parliament: the constituency of course consists entirely of the ten pound householders, duly qualified and registered: the number of houses of sufficient value to qualify their tenants is one hundred and five, the limits marked out for the franchise not only including the whole area between Prix Pill and Priory Pill, chiefly occupied by the town, but also the old village of Haking, on the opposite side of the latter inlet, and are more minutely detailed in the Appendix. A chapel of ease to the mother church, dedicated to St. Catherine, is situated at the eastern extremity of the street fronting the haven: it was erected chiefly at the expense of the Hon. Charles Francis Greville, lord of the manor, and was consecrated for divine service in the year 1808. It is an elegant structure in the later style of English architecture, with a lofty embattled tower, and consists of a nave, chancel, and north and south aisles: the roof is richly groined, and the windows are embellished with stained glass: the font, which is of very elegant design, is of Derbyshire marble, and opposite to it is a vase of red porphyry, which was brought from Egypt, and intended to be placed here, also the top-gallant mast of the French ship L'Orient, which was blown up in the battle of Aboukir. A little to the east of the present edifice are the remains of an ancient chapel, which was also dedicated to St. Catherine, and, after having been desecrated for many years, was converted into a powder magazine: it consisted of a nave and chancel, with a finely vaulted roof, which is still entire: the western end has fallen down, but the boundaries of the ancient cemetery may be distinctly traced. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. Milford gave the title of baron, in the peerage of Ireland, to the late Sir Richard Philipps, Bart., of Picton Castle, who dying without issue, in 1823, that dignity expired.

MINERA, an extensive chapelry in that part of the parish of WREXHAM which is in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (W. by N.) from Wrexham, containing 502 inhabitants. It comprises the western portion of the parish, which is hilly, and abounds with mineral wealth. The present name is supposed to be derived from this circumstance: its ancient appellation was Mwyn-Glawdd, or "the mine upon the ditch," in allusion to Offa's Dyke, which passes through it. It is bounded on the north by the river Alyn, which rises in this district. The greater portion of the inhabitants are employed in working the mines, which are on an extensive scale, consisting of iron, lead, and coal, the last of which are worked to a considerable extent; but the lead mines are at present discontinued, owing to the influx of water, and, though seven steam-engines and a mill have been employed in clearing them, the attempt has hitherto proved unsuccessful; the population has accordingly decreased since the census of 1821. The living is a perpetual curacy, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese, of St. Asaph, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Wrexham. The chapel is a small cruciform structure. This place separately maintains its own poor, according to an arrangement entered into in March 1830.

MISKIN (MYSGYN), a hamlet in the parish of LLANTRISSENT, hundred of MISKIN, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (N. E.) from Cowbridge. The population is included in the return for the parish. It was probably at a remote period a place of some consequence, having given name to the hundred: the river Ely bounds it on the west and is here crossed by a bridge.

MOCHLAS (MECHLAS), a township in the parish of KILKEN, Northop division of the hundred of COLES-HILL, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, containing 80 inhabitants, who are exclusively employed in agriculture, the number having increased nearly twofold since the census of 1821.

MOELVRE, a joint hamlet with Iddole, in the parish of LLANDEVEYLOG, hundred of KIDWELLY, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (S.) from Carmarthen, containing, with Iddole, 440 inhabitants. There are a few agreeable mansions in this hamlet, which commands a fine view of the river Towy, by which it is bounded on the west, and is the most improving hamlet in the parish, the population having increased nearly a fourth since the census of 1821: the road from Carmarthen to Kidwelly passes through it.

MOLD, a parish, comprising the borough and market town of Mold, and the chapelries of Nerquis and

Tryddin, which are separately assessed for the maintenance of their poor, in the hundred of MOLD, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, and containing 9385 inhabitants, of which number, 8086 are in the town of Mold (and that part of the parish immediately adjacent not comprised within the two chapelries), 6 miles (S.) from Flint, and 200 (N. W.) from London. The ancient British name of this place, Yr Wyddgrug, signifying "a lofty and conspicuous hill," and also its Roman name of Mons altus, of like import, were derived from a high mound on the north-western side of the present town, now called the Bailey Hill, a lofty eminence, partly natural and partly artificial, upon which a fortification appears to have been erected at a very early period, but whether originally by the ancient Britons, or by the Romans, is not accurately known. The only plausible arguments for ascribing it to the Romans are, the eligibility of its site for a place of defence, its proximity to the seat of their mining establishments in this part of the principality, and the discovery of a gold coin of the Emperor Vespasian near the spot. The advantages of the situation caused it to be subsequently the site of a more stately castle, erected by the Normans for the defence of the territories which they afterwards obtained possession of in this part of the country, and who, in their own language, describing its elevated situation, gave it the appellation of "Mont-ault," of which its present name is supposed to be a contraction. The historical events connected with this place refer to a very remote period. Soon after the final establishment of Christianity in this part of the principality, a severe conflict took place between the combined forces of the pagan Saxons and Picts, who were carrying desolation through this portion of the country, and the inhabitants, who had been recently converted, and of whom thousands had been but lately baptized. The latter calmly awaited the approach of the enemy at a place within a mile of the town, since called Maes Garmon, or "the Field of Germanus," under the command of Bishops Germanus and Lupus, the former of whom, having given his troops orders to repeat after him the word "Alleluiah," led them on to battle. This triumphant shout, uttered by the whole army, struck such terror into the hearts of the pagans, that they fled on all sides; numbers perished by the swords of their pursuers, and many, attempting to escape, were drowned in the adjacent river. This celebrated victory, which took place in Easter week, in the year 420, has been distinguished by historians with the appellation of "Victoria Alleluatica;" and the memorial of it has been perpetuated by the erection of a pillar, in 1730, on the spot where St. Germanus is said to have stood, on the base of which is a Latin inscription commemorative of the event.

From this period till after the Norman Conquest little is known of the history of this place, of which, under its present name, the first notice occurs in the 9th year of the reign of William Rufus, when that monarch granted it to his vassal, Eustace de Cruier, who did homage to him for the territories of Mold and Hopedale, which he erected into a kind of inferior lordship marcher, and for the defence of which newly acquired territories he built several castles, and among them, in all probability, the castle of this place. In the reign of Henry I.,

Mold formed part of the extensive possessions of Robert, Seneschal of Chester, surnamed, from his residence at this place, Robert de Montault, or Montalto. During his occupation of the castle it sustained many severe attacks from the Welsh; but it was so strongly fortified, both by nature and by art, that it resisted every effort to reduce it; and in numerous subsequent sieges, during a period of fourteen years, it opposed an impregnable barrier to the attempts of the native Britons to repossess themselves of the territory of which they had been despoiled by the Normans. The garrison, which was very numerous, made repeated inroads on the adjacent territories of their Welsh neighbours, till, in 1144, Owain Gwynedd, Prince of North Wales, in retaliation for their depredations, invested the castle with a large body of forces, which he commanded in person, took it by storm, put all the garrison to the sword, and is said to have levelled the walls with the ground: it is, however, stated that he occupied it by a small body of troops in 1149, when he advanced to give battle to Ranulph, Earl of Chester, whom he defeated with great slaughter. It appears to have been subsequently rebuilt by the English, from whom, in 1198, it was again taken by the Welsh, under the command of Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, who kept possession of it for some time. After remaining alternately in the hands of the English and the Welsh till the year 1240, it was stipulated in the treaty of peace concluded at that time between Henry III. and Davydd ab Llewelyn, Prince of North Wales, that the latter should surrender all such territories as had been claimed by the vassals of the former, except those of Mold, which he was suffered to retain in fulfilment of a treaty previously made between him and the Seneschal of Chester. The year following Henry revoked this treaty, and entered into a new agreement, by which he compelled Davydd to deliver up to Roger de Montalto, Seneschal of Chester, the whole of his lands in the lordship of Mold, together with the castle and all its dependencies. In 1245, Davydd besieged the castle, which he took by storm, and put the whole of the garrison to the sword: Roger alone escaped the carnage, being fortunately absent from the castle, at the time of its surrender. The castle, always an object of obstinate contention between the native princes of North Wales and the English, appears soon afterwards to have fallen into the possession of the latter, who held it till the year 1263, when it was besieged and taken by Gruffydd ab Gwenwynwyn, Lord of Powysland, who razed it to the ground. It was again rebuilt by the English, and restored to the family of De Montalto, and was placed under the custody of Roger de Clifford, justiciary of Chester, against whose oppressive tyranny, and that of his deputy, Roger Scrochil, the inhabitants of Ystrad Alun, or Molesdale, were loud in their complaints, a short time previously to the final subjection of the principality by Edward I. In 1322, Sir Gruffydd Llwyd, who had been knighted by that monarch for bringing him the news of the birth of his son in the castle of Carnarvon, and who, for some time after Edward's death, had continued a faithful adherent to the government of his son Edward II., finding the English yoke no longer tolerable, took up arms; and having assembled a large body of his countrymen, and overrun all North Wales and the marches, he seized upon this castle, but kept possession of it only for a very short time: his insurrection was not attended with success, and he was soon afterwards defeated and taken prisoner. From this time little more occurs of any military movements in which the castle of Mold had a share; it remained in the possession of the descendants of Robert de Montalto, who in 1302 did homage for it to Edward Prince of Wales at Chester; but in 1327, the last baron, in failure of male issue, conveyed it to Isabel, queen of Edward II., for life, and afterwards to John of Eltham, younger brother of Edward III., after whose decease without issue it reverted to the crown. It appears to have continued an appendage of the crown till the reign of Henry IV., by whom the castle and lordship, together with those of Hope and Hopedale, were granted to the Stanleys, afterwards Earls of Derby. Its final demolition, as a place of strength, is supposed to have taken place during this reign, and is attributed to Owain Glyndwr, who, in the course of his determined efforts to overthrow the government of Henry IV., committed depredations upon most of the estates in the principality belonging to the partisans of that monarch. On the first division of the principality into counties, in the reign of Henry VIII., Mold was annexed to the county of Denbigh; but in the thirty-third year of that monarch's reign it was assigned to the county of Flint, of which it has ever since that time continued to form a part. During the parliamentary war in the reign of Charles I., the ancient mansion of Gwysaney, near this town, was garrisoned for the king; but in 1645 it was taken by the parliamentary forces under Sir William Brereton. The lordship of Mold remained in the possession of the Stanleys till the death of James, the seventh earl, a zealous adherent to the cause of Charles I., who, after the battle of Worcester, was taken prisoner by the parliamentary forces and beheaded at Bolton in Lancashire. After his death the lordship was sold by the parliament; and a proposal having been made for repurchasing it by the Earl of Derby, the conditions of which that nobleman failed to fulfil, Charles II., in 1664, ordered that the former purchasers should retain it.

The town is pleasantly situated on a gentle acclivity in a small but fertile plain, watered by the river Alyn, which is here crossed by several bridges, and surrounded by rugged eminences, which are rich in mineral treasure: it consists principally of one long street, intersected at right angles by two smaller ones, is tolerably well paved, but indifferently supplied with water, and not lighted: the houses are not distinguished either for their regularity or style of building; but in the environs are numerous handsome seats and elegant mansions; and the surrounding scenery is richly diversified, and highly embellished with features of picturesque beauty. The views from the higher grounds, though confined, extend over a tract of country richly cultivated and varied with objects of interesting character and romantic appearance. The parish abounds with mineral wealth: the western district is rich in lead-ore, which is generally found imbedded in limestone or chert; but the operations are much impeded by the subterraneous stream of the Alyn, which here flows underground for the space of somewhat less than a mile: the eastern part of it contains an abundance of coal of excellent quality, which is procured in great quantities for the supply of the neighbouring works; and some fine seams of cannel coal are also found within two miles to the south of the town: calamine is also procured here. In the townships of Argoed and Bistre, in the north-eastern part of the parish, potters' clay is found in abundance; and large manufactories of earthenware and fire bricks have been established, affording employment to the poor in that district. Near these works are others for smelting lead; and almost adjoining the town are some extensive cotton mills. These mills, for the spinning of cotton twist, are situated on the river Alyn; they were erected in 1792, lighted with gas in 1812, and greatly enlarged in 1825, and at present afford employment to more than three hundred persons. Upwards of four thousand acres of waste land were enclosed in this parish under the provisions of an act obtained in 1792. The turnpike roads from Chester to Ruthin, and from Holyhead to Wrexham, pass through the town. The market days are Wednesday and Saturday; and fairs are held annually on February 13th, May 12th, August 2nd, and November 22nd. By the late act for amending the representation of the people Mold has been constituted a borough, contributory with Flint and the other boroughs in the county in the return of a member to parliament: the right of voting is vested in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of ten pounds and upwards, provided he be capable of registering as the act directs: the present number of such tenements within the limits of the borough, which are co-extensive with the township of Mold, and include an area of about five hundred and seventy acres, is about one hundred and fifty, of which one hundred and forty are in the town. Though Flint is the county town, yet, from the want of a county hall there, and the central situation of this place, which is now within the North Wales circuit, the assizes are held here, in a house hired for that purpose from a private individual; and it is in contemplation to erect at Mold a county hall and prison, plans and specifications of which have already been submitted to the notice of the county magistrates: the estimated expense of these buildings is £11,000.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, and said to have been erected in the early part of the sixteenth century, is a spacious and handsome structure, in the purest character of the later style of English architecture, consisting of a nave, north and south aisles, and a chancel, with a lofty square embattled tower, enriched with sculpture and crowned with pinnacles, which, though of more recent erection, precisely corresponds with the general design. In taking down the old tower the workmen discovered, at the depth of a foot below the ground, a layer of burnt wheat, barley, rye, and beans, three inches thick, upon an earthen floor from four to five yards square, under which was deposited in regular order a great number of human bones, about half a yard in depth, and a stone which had been worked into the foundation, upon which was inscribed "Here lieth the body of Gwenllian, daughter of Evan ab David ab Yorwerth." The walls of the church are crowned with an elegant pierced parapet, under which are the figures of various animals finely sculptured in stone. The interior of the church is richly embellished with architectural details and sculptured ornaments: the nave is separated from the aisles by a fine range of seven light clustered columns with foliated capitals, supporting on each side a series of obtusely pointed arches, the spandrils of which are highly enriched with finely sculptured devices of angels bearing shields charged with emblematic allusions to the Passion of Our Saviour, among which is a representation of the Veronica, and with the armorial bearings of such benefactors as contributed towards the erection of the church, among which the arms of the Stanley family are conspicuous. The aisles are lighted by spacious and lofty windows of elegant design, enriched with tracery, and corresponding in form to the arches of the nave; and at the eastern extremity of each aisle are three highly enriched and canopied niches, in which were formerly statues now destroyed. The niches in the south aisle are almost concealed by monuments, including a very superb one to the memory of Robert Davies, of Llanerch, Esq., who died in 1728, on which is his effigy in an erect posture, habited in Roman costume. Near this is a mural monument to the memory of his grandfather, Robert Davies, of Gwysaney, the ancient residence of the family prior to their acquisition of Llanerch in the Vale of Clwyd. In the same aisle is an ancient mural tablet to the memory of Robert Warton, otherwise Parfew, abbot of Bermondsey in Surrey, and afterwards Bishop of St. Asaph, from which see he was translated, in 1554, to that of Hereford, where he died in 1557, and was interred: above his armorial bearings, in a shield on which are also quartered the arms of the see of St. Asaph, is a label, inscribed "Robtus pmissione Divina Epus Assav," supported at one end by an angel, and at the other by a bishop. In the churchyard was dug up a stone, bearing the inscription "Fundamentum Ecclesie Christus," and underneath it the signature "W. H. Eps.," supposed to have been that of Bishop William Hughes, who died in the year 1600. There are two chapels within the parish, one at Nerquis, three miles from the town, and the other at Tryddin, about five miles distant. There are places of worship for Independents, and for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, all of which are well built, particularly that for the last-named sect. In 1744, the Rev. Hugh Lloyd, vicar of this parish, built a school-house, which he endowed with a rent-charge of £10, payable from certain lands in the parish, for the support of a master for the gratuitous instruction of poor children: this endowment was subsequently augmented by Mr. Dodd, who in 1780 bequeathed £100 for the support of this school, and also by a bequest of Mr. James Hughes, of the parish of Mile End, in the county of Middlesex, who in 1793 left to this school £100 three per cent. consols. The produce of these several bequests is now paid to the support of a National school, erected by subscription in 1823, in which sixty boys and fifty girls receive gratuitous instruction. A tenement in the parish of Caerwys was charged by an unknown benefactor with the payment of £20 per annum, to be distributed weekly in bread to the poor; and a rent-charge of £18 on a tenement in the parish of Hawarden; another of £8 on a tenement in the vicinity of this place; and a third of £2 on a tenement in the parish of Llanverras, were also severally bequeathed by unknown benefactors to the poor of this parish. The Rev. Dr. Wynne, of Tower, bequeathed £2. 10. per annum to poor widows and widowers of Broncoed and Mold; John Wynne, Esq., of Waen, bequeathed £1 per annum to purchase shoes for the poor of those places, and an unknown benefactor gave the same annual sum to buy hats for the poor of Llwynegrin and Mold. The interest of various benefactions in money, and the proceeds of other sums which have been vested in the purchase of land to a considerable amount, are annually distributed among the poor of this parish.

Of the ancient castle not a vestige at present can be discerned, and its very site is completely covered with thriving plantations: the three fosses by which it was formerly defended are still traceable, and from these it appears to have originally consisted of the upper and lower ballium, and an elevated donjon, or keep, each of which was separated from the others by a deep fosse. The Bailey Hill, on which it stood, though at present difficult of ascent, was rendered still more arduous by the erection of strong ramparts and the formation of a deep moat: from the summit of this hill a fine view of the surrounding vale is obtained, and in the distance the bare summit of Moel Vamma, towering amidst the Clwydian range of mountains, is seen to great advantage. Offa's Dyke enters this parish from Denbighshire, pursuing its course through a small valley on the south side of Bryn Yorkyn mountain, to Coed Talwrn, and Cae Twn, a farm near Tryddin chapel, beyond which it ceases to be here traceable. Numerous tumuli are found in various parts of the parish, affording evidence of the obstinacy with which the possession of the Vale of Alyn was contested by the various hostile parties who overran this part of the country in the earlier periods of its history. Several of these have been opened, and found to differ materially in their construction and contents, thus proving that they were raised at various periods and by different races of people. The environs of the town are enlivened by numerous ancient mansions and handsome seats, the residence of some of the principal families of the neighbourhood, and with the remains of others which are now occupied by farmers. The ancient mansion of Gwysaney, formerly the residence of the family of Davies, of Llanerch, and already noticed as having been garrisoned for the king during the parliamentary war, is in this parish. Tower, or Bryn Coed, formerly the seat of Dr. William Wynne, though small, presents a singular specimen of the style of domestic architecture during the ages of lawless violence in which it was erected: it consists of an ancient square tower of three stories, and appears to have been designed as a place of fortified habitation. During the war between the houses of York and Lancaster, it was inhabited by Reinalt ab Gruffydd ab Bleddyn, one of the captains who defended Harlech castle for Henry VI., and who was constantly engaged in feuds with the people of Chester. In 1465, a considerable number of the latter came to Mold fair, and a fray arising between the hostile parties, great slaughter ensued on both sides; but Reinalt, who obtained the victory, took the mayor of Chester prisoner, and conveyed him to his mansion, where he hung him on the staple in his great hall. To avenge this affront, a party of two hundred men was despatched from Chester to seize Reinalt, who, retiring from his house into the adjoining woods, permitted a few of them to enter the building, when, rushing from his concealment, he blocked up the door, and, setting fire to the house, destroyed them in the flames: he then attacked the remainder, whom he pursued with great slaughter, and such as escaped the sword were drowned in attempting to regain their home: the staple on which the mayor was hung still remains fixed in the ceiling of the lower apartment. Lees wood, the seat of J. W. Eyton, Esq., is a large handsome mansion, beautifully situated on a fine slope, and surrounded with woods and pleasure grounds tastefully laid out: the entrance is through a magnificent gateway, and the grounds comprehend much finely varied scenery. Peutrehobin, a fine old family mansion, built in 1540, and formerly the property of Trevor Lloyd, Esq., retains much of its ancient character. Hartsheath, the deserted mansion of Gwilym Lloyd Wardle, Esq., is pleasantly situated on a long eminence in the Vale of Alyn, of which it commands a fine view: the grounds, which are richly wooded and tastefully disposed, combine a pleasing variety of picturesque scenery; and the views embrace many interesting objects of romantic character, among which is the isolated rock of Caergwrlle, abruptly rising from the vale, and crowned with the ruins of its ancient castle. Nerquis Hall, the seat of Miss Gifford, a good family mansion built in 1638 by John Wynne, Esq., is pleasantly situated: the grounds comprehend some varied scenery, in which the spire of Nerquis chapel, at no great distance, forms an interesting feature. Rhual, an ancient family mansion noticed by Leland, now the residence of Col. Philips, a descendant of the founder was erected in 1634, by Evan Edwards, Esq.: the house, which is substantially built, contains some good paintings, among which is a portrait of the founder by Vandyke. Plâs Teg, formerly the property of the family of the Trevors, for many years occupied as a farm-house, and now the residence of — Roper, Esq., is a stately mansion, said to have been built in 1610, from a design by Inigo Jones: it consists of a centre flanked at the angles by square towers, the whole five stories high; the hall is forty-three feet long and twenty-three feet wide, and above it is a dining-room of the same dimensions, to which the ascent is by a spacious and noble staircase; in each of the towers is an apartment twenty-two feet long and nineteen feet wide; and the whole building has an air of great regularity and an appearance of simple grandeur. In the various mines in this parish are found impressions of fern and other vegetable plants in great perfection, a variety of marine shells of pearly freshness, and fossil remains of various kinds, in great abundance. Wilson, the celebrated landscape painter, who lived in the adjoining parish of Llanverras, was interred in the churchyard of this parish, near the north side of the church. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor of the entire parish amounts to £2827. 9., of which sum, £2277. 13. is assessed on that portion which is distinct from the chapelries of Nerquis and Tryddin, which are described under their appropriate heads.

MONINGTON, a parish in the hundred of KEMMES, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (W. S. W.) from Cardigan, containing 102 inhabitants. This place was by the Welsh called Eglwys Wythwr, signifying literally "the church of eight men," there being at the time of its foundation precisely that number of freeholders in the parish. The parish comprises but a moderate area, which is all enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The surrounding scenery is not distinguished by any peculiar features; but the views from the higher grounds embrace some objects of interest. The living is a vicarage not in charge, consolidated with that of St. Dogmael's, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Nicholas, is situated at the south-western declivity of a lofty eminence. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £67. 18.

MONKNASH (MONK-NASH), a parish in the hundred of OGMORE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (W. S. W.) from Cowbridge, containing 121 inhabitants. This manor, together with the castle and lordship of Neath, was given by Fitz-Hamon to Sir Richard de Grenville, and by him conferred on the monks of Neath abbey, from which circumstance it has derived the prefix to its name. The parish is situated on the shore of the Bristol channel: the coast is extremely dangerous for some miles between it and Barry. The Nash sands are a perilous ridge, covered at high water, but exposed at low water, on which the Frolic steam vessel from Tenby to Bristol, laden with passengers, struck, in the month of March, 1831, the weather being exceedingly tempestuous and hazy, when all on board perished: recently two light-houses have been erected near them, which serve to warn navigators of the danger, as they stretch several miles westward from the coast, and the sounding immediately contiguous is four fathoms. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Hon. William Booth Grey. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £36. 11.

MONTGOMERY, a borough, market town, and parish, in the lower division of the hundred of MONTGOMERY, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 7½ miles (S.) from Welshpool, and 17½ (W. N. W.) from London, through Shrewsbury, and 169 by way of Ludlow, containing 1188 inhabitants. The ancient British name of this place, Trê

Arms.

Valdwyn, or "Baldwyn's town," was derived from the erection of a castle and the consequent establishment of a town here by a Norman adventurer of that name, for the security of this part of the principality, which he had reduced by force of arms, and for which, upon that condition, he had previously done homage to William the Conqueror, by whom he was appointed lieutenant of the marches. Baldwyn, though justly regarded as the founder of the castle and town, did not long retain possession of the territories which he had thus gained by conquest. In the reign of William Rufus, Roger de Montgomery, who had been created Earl of Shrewsbury, and had obtained from that monarch a licence to secure to himself such territories on the west of the river Severn as he could obtain by force of arms, entered the principality of Powys with a considerable army, and, seizing this castle and town, strengthened the fortifications of the former, and surrounded the latter with a wall: having thus succeeded in securing permanent possession of them, he was in a short time regarded their second founder, and they have consequently since that period been distinguished as the castle and town of Montgomery. In the following year the Welsh, mustering all their strength, took the castle by surprise, plundered the town and laid waste the adjacent territory: but the castle was soon repaired and the fortifications strengthened by William Rufus, who, hearing while in Normandy of the dreadful outrages committed by the forces of Gruffydd ab Cynan, Prince of North Wales, and the sons of Bleddyn ab Cynvyn, advanced at the head of a large army to the Welsh frontier, to repress their incursions. His repeated attacks were, however, attended with very inconsiderable success; the Welsh sustained the conflict with obstinate intrepidity and persevering vigour, and the only advantage which the English monarch derived from his campaign was the opportunity of throwing supplies into the castle of Montgomery. The Welsh, elated with their recent success, immediately after the retreat of the English army, laid siege to this fortress, which at that time was considered the strongest and best fortified of any in the marches. The garrison opposed a brave and resolute defence, and for many days successfully repelled the vigorous attacks of the assailants; but the Welsh, having at length made several breaches in the walls, by undermining them, carried the castle by storm, put the garrison to the sword, and levelled the fortifications with the ground.

This arduous struggle between the Norman lords of the marches, to retain possession of the territories which they held by right of conquest, and the native Welsh, whose ardent anxiety to regain their lost dominions incited them to acts of the most desperate valour, was maintained with equal obstinacy on both sides for several years; and many of the leaders of both parties were slain. But the English finally prevailed; and having, by their superior numbers and discipline, gained a decisive victory over the stubborn Welsh patriots, compelled them once more to retire to their strong holds in the mountains. After this the Earl of Shrewsbury rebuilt the castle of Montgomery; and in 1114, Owain, brother of Gruffydd ab Rhys, Prince of South Wales, being taken prisoner by the English, was confined in it, but he effected his escape and fled for refuge to the court of Gruffydd ab Cynan, Prince of North Wales. In 1223, Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, Prince of North Wales, having made numerous incursions into the territories of the English vassals, and perpetrated various acts of depredation and violence, for which he refused to render any satisfactory atonement, Henry III., who had taken the field with a powerful army to chastise his insolence, returning towards the marches from a successful expedition into Radnorshire, rebuilt the castle of Montgomery in a situation better adapted to check the incursions of the Welsh, and on a site, the advantages of which, united with its own natural strength, rendered it at that time impregnable. The custody of this important fortress the English monarch confided to his great justiciary, Hubert de Burgh, with an annual salary of two hundred marks, which allowance for the maintenance of the garrison was augmented in times of war. In 1228, the soldiers of the garrison, assisted by such of the natives as were under their control, attempted to open a road through the adjoining forest, an extensive tract of fifteen miles in length, which had long afforded a secure retreat to the Welsh, who, concealing themselves in this impenetrable recess, made frequent predatory incursions on the lands of the English vassals, whom they often surprised and murdered. While the men were engaged in this work, they were suddenly attacked by a large party of the natives, who, issuing from their concealment, compelled them with great slaughter to retire for refuge within the castle, to which they afterwards laid regular siege. The garrison, upon this occasion, sent to England for assistance, and Henry, attended by Hubert de Burgh, coming to their relief with all possible expedition, the Welsh raised the siege and retired into their strong holds. Henry having, soon after his arrival here, received a reinforcement, resolved to penetrate into the recesses of the forest; and having with great difficulty opened a road for his army, by setting fire to the woods, at length reached a solitary abbey of Carmelite friars, called Cridia, which, as it had hitherto afforded an asylum to his enemies, he reduced to ashes. Upon the site of this monastery Hubert de Burgh laid the foundation of a castle, in the erection of which Henry's whole army was employed with incredible labour and under innumerable difficulties. In the middle of a thick forest in the heart of an enemy's country, surrounded by skirmishing parties of the foe, and exposed to every hazard, the English persevered for three months in the erection of this new fortress, which it was intended to make impregnable. During this period the Welsh, watching every movement, and ready to take advantage of every favourable opportunity, frequently intercepted the English convoys, and slew their foraging parties; till at length, from the want of provisions, and a suspicion of treachery in his camp, Henry was induced to relinquish his undertaking, when it was nearly completed, and to conclude a treaty of peace with the Welsh prince, Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, in which it was stipulated that this fortress, in the erection of which so much labour, blood, and treasure had been expended, should be levelled with the ground.

In 1231, a party of the Welsh forces having made an incursion into the territories dependent upon the castle of Montgomery, the English, who had secretly posted themselves in a situation to cut off their retreat, suddenly attacked them, and putting the greater number to the sword, conveyed the remainder captives into the castle, where, by the command of Hubert de Burgh, they were instantly delivered to the executioner, and their heads sent as a present to the English monarch. Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, to avenge this outrage upon his countrymen, laid waste the English marches with the most unrelenting fury; and, in the general consternation which the violence and rapidity of his devastation had excited, Hubert de Burgh was himself compelled to take refuge in England. Llewelyn, intent upon conquest and revenge, bore down all opposition; and among other fortresses, then in the power of the English, of which he obtained possession, took the castle of Montgomery, which he committed to the flames, and put all the garrison to death. But the castle was almost immediately recovered by a party of English forces, and Llewelyn again attempted to retake it, for which purpose he encamped his troops on a meadow at a short distance, in part of which was a deep morass. Near this place was the Cistercian abbey of Cymer, one of the brethren of which was instructed by Llewelyn to deceive the garrison with false intelligence. The English soldiers, seeing the friar pass under the walls of the castle, entered into conversation with him, and, being informed that Llewelyn with a small force was waiting for a reinforcement, and might be easily taken or put to flight, a party of horse was despatched from the castle to attack him by surprise. On their approach, the Welsh, apparently with great precipitation, retreated into a wood; and the English, in the eagerness of their pursuit, plunged deep into the morass, in which many were suffocated or drowned, and the rest, encumbered with their armour and entangled in the bog, became an easy prey to the Welsh, who quickly put them to death with their spears. Henry had been for some time preparing for a campaign against Wales, and this disaster tended to accelerate the arrival of the English army, commanded by that monarch in person, who, on his reaching the abbey of Cymer, in resentment for the treachery of the friar, set fire to the grange, and would also have burnt the monastery itself, had not the abbot saved it by the payment of three hundred marks.

In 1259, the English monarch concluded a truce for one year with Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, Prince of North Wales, which was ratified by commissioners on both sides at the ford of Montgomery, and on its expiration was renewed at the same place, with additional stipulations. The castle of Montgomery, together with several other fortresses, was ceded by Simon de Montfort, under the sanction of the English king, to Llewelyn, in 1265; and, in the year 1268, a conference was held there, and a treaty of peace concluded, between Henry and Llewelyn, through the mediation of Ottoboni, the pope's legate in England, which was ratified by the contracting parties in person, and received from the legate the sanction of the pope's authority. By this treaty the territories taken by both parties during the war were to be restored, the Prince of Wales was to do fealty to the English king for the principality, as had been done by his predecessors, and was to pay into the English treasury the sum of twenty-five thousand marks. After the melancholy death of Llewelyn, in the reign of Edward I., and the entire subjugation of Wales by that monarch, Madoc, an illegitimate son of the Welsh prince, raised a formidable insurrection in the northern parts of the principality, and gained several brilliant victories over the English, particularly in the marches; but being at length attacked by the united forces of the lords marcher, on the mountain called by the Welsh Mynydd Digoll, and by the English the Long Mountain, about five miles from Montgomery, he was defeated and slain with most of his adherents. Edward I. granted to

Bogo de Knouill, constable of the castle of Montgomery, a certain quantity of timber out of his forest of Corn-don, to defray the expense of repairing the walls and ditches round this town and castle; and a grant for the same purpose was made by Edward III., under the authority of which a toll was to be taken for seven years on certain articles exposed for sale at the market, among which squirrels' skins are enumerated. In 1354, the castle, together with the hundred of Chirbury, in which it was then regarded as being comprised, is mentioned, in an inquisition obtained for the reversal of the attainder against him, as forming part of the possessions of Roger Mortimer, Earl of March, at the time of his death; after which it passed, by the marriage of his sister and sole heiress Anne, to the house of York, and thence came into the possession of the crown. It appears to have been held, as stewards of the crown, by the immediate ancestors of Lord Herbert of Chirbury, and to have been the principal residence of that family. During the parliamentary war in the reign of Charles I., the castle was garrisoned for the king, by Lord Herbert, whom that monarch had previously appointed governor, but who, in 1644, on the approach of a parliamentary army under the command of Sir Thomas Myddelton, embraced the adverse cause, and displaced the royalist troops by a garrison of republican soldiers, of whom he was entrusted with the command. An army of four thousand royalists, under the command of Lord Byron, soon after Lord Herbert's defection, approaching Montgomery, compelled the forces under Sir Thomas Myddelton to make a precipitate retreat to Oswestry, leaving Lord Herbert with a weak garrison but ill supplied with ammunition and provisions. The royalists immediately laid siege to the castle, which must soon have been surrendered; but Sir Thomas Myddelton, being strengthened with a reinforcement under the conduct of Sir William Brereton, Sir John Meldrum, and Sir Thomas Fairfax, immediately marched to its relief. A general engagement now became inevitable: the royalists, to the number of five thousand men, were posted on the hill above the castle, and the parliamentarians, to the number of three thousand, were drawn up in the plain below: the former, descending the hill, commenced the attack, and for some time gained considerable advantage; but the parliamentary soldiers, led on by some of the ablest of their generals, and urged by the necessity of throwing succours into this important fortress, rallied, and, after many desperate efforts, succeeded in reversing the fortune of the day, and ultimately, after a severe and sanguinary conflict, obtained a complete and decisive victory. The royalists were pursued towards Shrewsbury; more than five hundred of them were killed in the battle and in the pursuit, and fourteen hundred were taken prisoners: of the parliamentarians, only sixty were killed and one hundred wounded. The castle was afterwards dismantled by order of the parliament; but it appears that Lord Herbert received a compensation for the loss which his property sustained on that occasion.

The town is pleasingly and romantically situated partly on the summit and partly on the declivity of a hill rising from the southern bank of the river Severn, and under the shelter of a mountain of loftier elevation. Though the county town, it is small in extent and of inconsiderable importance, consisting only of four streets diverging nearly at right angles from the market-place, which is in the centre: the houses are well built and of respectable appearance; and the town, which is partially paved and amply supplied with water, has a prepossessing aspect, well adapted to render it the residence of genteel families. The environs are strikingly beautiful, abounding with richly diversified and highly picturesque scenery; and the hill on which the town is built commands a fine and extensive view of the Vale of Montgomery, watered by the river Severn, and bounded in the distance by the Shropshire mountains. There is neither any trade nor manufacture carried on: the market, which is amply supplied with corn and provisions of all kinds, is on Thursday; and fairs are held annually on March 26th, June 7th, September 4th, and November 12th, for cattle, sheep, and horses.

The inhabitants received their first charter of incorporation in the 11th of Henry III., who made the place a free borough, and endowed it with many privileges and immunities. By this charter the government is vested in two bailiffs and twelve principal burgesses, or common-councilmen, assisted by a town-clerk, who acts as recorder, a coroner, two serjeants at mace, and other officers, who are annually elected at Michaelmas by a common hall of burgesses, each of whom, after serving the office of bailiff, is styled an alderman. The elective franchise was conferred in the 27th of Henry VIII., who, as the shire town, empowered it, in conjunction with its contributory boroughs of Llanidloes, Llanvyllin, Machynlleth, and Welshpool, to send one member to parliament. Since that period the right of election has undergone material alteration: on a petition to the House of Commons, in 1680, complaining of an undue return, it was resolved that the right of election was vested not only in the burgesses of Montgomery, but also in those of the contributory boroughs of Llanidloes, Llanvyllin, and Welshpool; and on a similar petition, presented to the House in 1728, it was resolved that the elective franchise was confined solely to the borough of Montgomery, which since that time has continued to return one member, to the exclusion of the above-named contributory boroughs. These resolutions of the House of Commons being at variance with each other, the burgesses of Llanidloes, Llanvyllin, and Welshpool, and also those of Machynlleth, the latter having neglected to support their claim at the two former periods, were, by an act of the 28th of George III., allowed the power of asserting their privilege of voting for a member for Montgomery before another committee of the House, and of appealing within twelve calendar months against any future decision. By the late act for amending the representation these boroughs have been again permitted to share in the return of a member, the elective franchise having been extended to the resident inhabitants, duly qualified according to the provisions of the act; and, for the purpose of taking the votes, the bailiffs of Montgomery are to appoint deputies at each place, who will send to them their poll books, for the purpose of ascertaining the aggregate amount, and making the return. The elective franchise was formerly in the burgesses at large, the number of whom claiming it for the borough of Montgomery was, at the time of passing the late Reform Act, about one hundred and eighty-five: it is now vested in the resident burgesses only, if duly qualified according to the provisions of the act, and in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act directs: the present number of tenements of this value, within the limits of the borough, which are co-extensive with those of the parish, including an agricultural district of nearly ten miles in circumference, and have not been altered by the late Boundary Act, is about fifty: the bailiffs are the returning officers. The freedom of the borough is inherited by the sons of burgesses, on their coming of age, and obtained by gift of the bailiffs and burgesses in common hall assembled. The bailiffs are justices of the peace within the borough, in which the county magistrates have a concurrent jurisdiction. The corporation have power to hold a court of record for the recovery of debts to any amount, every third Tuesday, the jurisdiction of which extends over the borough. Though Montgomery is reputed the county town, the assizes are held at Welshpool; but the quarter sessions are always held here. The election of a member for the county has hitherto taken place either here or at Machynlleth, being regulated by the sitting of the county court at the time of issuing the writ. The town-hall, standing in the centre of the town, is a neat plain building of brick, supported on arches enclosing a sheltered area for the use of the market: the upper part, which was very inadequate to the purpose of holding the quarter sessions, was taken down in 1828, and two handsome and convenient rooms were constructed on a plan better adapted to that use, at the sole expense of Lord Clive, to whom the building belongs. The principal room is sixty-seven feet and a half in length, and twenty feet and a half in width, having a moveable partition at one end, forming a retiring-room for the jury: this apartment, which is well lighted and handsomely fitted up, is used for assemblies and public meetings, and in the centre of the west side is the court-room, which is twenty-nine feet and a half in length, and twenty-one feet wide, and is commodiously arranged for the business of the sessions. The new county gaol and house of correction, at the lower end of the town, on the left of the road to Shrewsbury, was built at an expense of £10,000, defrayed by the county: it is a handsome edifice of stone of a durable quality, procured from the rock on which the castle formerly stood, and is arranged in the form of a cross, having the governor's house in the centre, the whole being enclosed within a boundary wall upwards of twenty feet in height: the governor's house commands a view of all the wards, and the working of the tread-mill, which is a double one, having one wheel in the felons' ward, and the other in the vagrants' ward, and the machinery is so contrived, that the labour can be regulated according to the force supplied. The building comprises six wards, with spacious airing-yards to each, in two of which there are a tread-wheel and an engine-house to supply the prison with water; above the engine-house and tread-wheel is an infirmary, with two sick wards and matron's rooms; and over the governor's apartments is the chapel, to which there is a separate entrance from each ward: beyond the chapel is an ante-room leading to a committee-room for the visiting magistrates, and two waiting-rooms; and on the roof, over the entrance and turnkey's lodge, is the place of execution. The ward for female prisoners, which, according to the plan, is to occupy a distinct wing, will not at present be completed: they will in the interim be confined in the old house of correction, which, by recent alterations and additions, has been made sufficiently convenient for that purpose, and comprises two wards and apartments for the keeper.

The parish of Montgomery was anciently included in that of Chirbury, to which the church was originally a chapel of ease. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £17. 4. 4½., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Nicholas, is an ancient and venerable cruciform structure, in the early style of English architecture, with a tower at the extremity of the north transept, which was erected in 1816, at an expense of £1700, defrayed solely by Lord Clive. The chancel is separated from the nave by an exquisitely carved screen and ancient rood-loft, removed from the priory of Chirbury, after the dissolution of that establishment: the north transept, called Brockton chancel, was built by the prior of Chirbury, for the accommodation of the tenants of his manor of Calmore, in this parish; and the south transept, called Lymore chancel, is appropriated to the seat of Lymore Park, the property of Lord Clive. The roof is neatly panelled into compartments, and in some parts is richly carved; and the east end of the chancel and the west end of the nave are lighted with large lancet-shaped windows. In the south transept, or Lymore chancel, which is separated from the church by two finely pointed arches, is a splendid monument to the memory of Richard Herbert, Esq., father of Lord Herbert of Chirbury, and Magdalene his wife, in which are the recumbent effigies of the former in complete armour, and of the latter by his side on an altar-tomb, in the front of which are representations of their six sons and two daughters in a kneeling posture; and under the tomb is the figure of Richard wrapped in his winding sheet. Near this monument are the effigies of two knights in complete armour, of the noble family of the Mortimers, Earls of March. Previously to the Reformation there was a chapel in one of the transepts, dedicated to St. Mary. The churchyard, which is of considerable extent, and commands a fine view of the adjacent country, is surrounded with a beautiful walk shaded by lime and elm trees of stately and luxuriant growth. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. Edward Herbert, Esq., in the reign of Elizabeth, bequeathed a rent-charge of £9. 12., issuing from a tenement called Oxley, or Gwern-yr-Ychen, in the parish of Llandyssil, of which sum, £5 was to be appropriated to a master and £2 to a mistress, for teaching poor children, and the remainder to the poor. Mr. John Lloyd, a native of this town, in 1747, bequeathed the residue of his estate and effects to his executor, John Edwards, of Deptford, in the county of Kent, to be applied to such charitable uses as he should think fit. Mr. Edwards, becoming possessed of this property under the provisions of the act of mortmain, which invalidated the conditions of the bequest, appropriated £4 per annum to the teaching of ten boys and ten girls, children of burgesses, including a boy and a girl from Oxley, and also one boy and one girl from Weston-Madoc, in the parish of Churchstoke: this endowment is augmented by Lord Clive to £20 per annum, which is paid to a master for teaching twenty children. There are Sunday schools in connexion with the established church, and also with the congregation of Calvinistic Methodists, in the former of which forty-five boys and thirty-five girls are instructed: the girls are annually clothed by subscription. There are likewise several charitable donations and bequests in land and in money, the produce of which is annually distributed among the poor of the parish.

Of the ancient castle there are but very inconsiderable remains, consisting chiefly of the fragment of a tower at the south-western angle, and a few detached portions of low walls, which afford but a very inadequate memorial of its former extent and magnificence. This fortress occupied the extremity of a long eminence, on the northern side of the town, and apparently impended over it, the projecting ridge being of great height, very steep, with an escarpment quite precipitous: it was defended by four deep fosses cut in the solid rock, anciently crossed by draw-bridges. Between the extremity of the building and the precipitous declivity of the height on which it stood is a level spot of ground, which is supposed to have formed the place of parade for the garrison. Within the last thirty years part of the shattered walls fell down, and among the disjointed fragments a labourer found several silver spoons, which he soon after sold to an itinerant dealer; and, at various times, ancient military weapons, broken swords, arrow heads, and cannon balls, have been discovered among the ruins. At the bottom of the hill, on the north side of the road leading to Garthmill, are the remains of a smaller fortress, surrounded by a moat, and having an artificial mound near the western extremity of the area: they are supposed to indicate the site of the ancient castle originally built by the Norman Baldwyn, prior to the erection of the later castle by Henry III. On a hill at no great distance from the latter are the remains of a very extensive camp, evidently of British origin: this hill is intersected by several deep fosses in that part where it is most accessible, and in other parts it is sufficiently protected by its precipitous declivity: the approach is guarded by four smaller fosses, from which were two entrances to the main work. Between the towns of Montgomery and Welshpool are the remains of a spacious Roman fortification, called the Gaer: it is situated on the Roman road which passed through the Vale of Severn, from Caer-Sws or Maglona, near Machynlleth. Of the walls by which the town was anciently surrounded, flanked by round and square bastion towers, and in which were four gates, called respectively, "Arthur's, Cede-wen, Ceri, and Chirbury" gates, all of which have long since disappeared, there are still some remains, varying in different places, from a few inches only to several feet in height above the surface of the ground. A fosse

near the bottom of the town still indicates the ancient site of Black Hall, once the hospitable mansion of the family of Herbert: it was consumed by fire, on which occasion the lodge in Lymore Park, at a small distance from the town, was enlarged and fitted up for the reception of the family: it is still kept up by Lord Clive, and, with its ancient front of timber frame-work and plaister, forms an interesting and venerable feature in the scenery of the park. From the castle hill, and from that on which the large British camp above noticed is situated, are extensive and fine views of the vales of Montgomery, Churchstoke, and Chirbury; but the most magnificent prospect of the surrounding country is obtained from the hill immediately above them. The ground continues gradually to rise to the summit of this eminence, which is crowned by a fine cluster of fir trees, and the view embraces the extent of the Vale of Severn for several miles, through which that noble river pursues a winding course among verdant meadows and luxuriant groves, by which latter it is frequently intercepted from the sight, assuming the appearance of numerous small lakes, the banks of which are richly decorated with picturesque and romantic scenery. Among the many interesting objects which this extensive prospect embraces are, Powis castle and park, numerous gentlemen's seats and pleasure grounds, picturesque villages, and distant hills of varied appearance, in beautiful and harmonious contrast, beyond which are seen, in towering magnificence, the lofty mountains of Plinlimmon and Cader Idris, and the fine chain of the Arans. Edward Herbert, first baron of Chirbury, and distinguished equally for the versatility of his talents and the eccentricity of his character, is by some said to have been a native of this place. He has been noticed above, as holding the office of governor of Montgomery castle: he was the author of several works, including memoirs of his life, and of a work entitled "De Veritate," upon which he appears to have principally rested his claim to literary reputation, and his character as a philosopher: he was born in 1583, and died in 1648. This is one of the parishes incorporated for the maintenance of their poor in the house of industry at Forden: the average annual assessment upon it for this purpose is £337. 16.

MONTGOMERYSHIRE, an inland county of NORTH WALES, bounded on the south-east, east, and north-east by the English county of Salop, and a small detached portion of Denbighshire; on the north, by Denbighshire; on the north-west and west, by Merionethshire; on the south-west, by Cardiganshire; and on the south, by Radnorshire; the two latter counties forming part of South Wales. It extends from 52° 21' to 52° 51' (N. Lat.), and from 3° to 3° 54' (W. Lon.); and includes an area, according to Evans' Map of North Wales, of four hundred and ninety-one thousand six hundred statute acres, or about seven hundred and sixty-eight square miles. The population, in 1831, was 66,485.

At the period of the Roman invasion of Britain, this county, in common with nearly all the rest of North Wales, was included in the territory of the Ordovices. Under the Roman dominion it contained the station Mediolanum, considered by Sir Richard Colt Hoare and most other antiquaries to have been situated in the Vale of the Tanat, or that of the Vyrnwy;

besides which there are supposed to have been other minor establishments of this people, at Caer-Sws, in the vicinity of Newtown, and at the Gaer, near Montgomery. The Roman roads which traversed it were the Via Devana, which, from the station Nidus, at Neath, in Glamorganshire, crossed the eastern part of it, in its progress to the station Deva, at Chester; and a branch of the southern Watling-street, which crossed the northern part of it to Segontium, the present Carnarvon; besides which were several vicinal ways. On the partition of the sovereignty of North Wales, about the year 876, by Rhodri Mawr, or Roderic the Great, among his three sons, Montgomeryshire was included in the kingdom of Powys, the seat of the government of which, originally established at Pengwern, the present Shrewsbury, was afterwards, on the native Britons being driven from the plains of Shropshire into the mountains of the principality, by the victorious arms of the Mercian monarch Offa, removed to Mathraval, near Meivod, in the beautiful Vale of the Vyrnwy. Henceforward this sovereignty was called indifferently the kingdom of Powys, or of Mathraval, the extent of which, however, was still further diminished by the invasions of the Mercians, whose warlike leader raised a conspicuous barrier between his newly-acquired territories and those still possessed by the Cymry, which included in the Mercian kingdom the eastern part of the territory at present forming the county of Montgomery. Numerous were the excursions made across this boundary by the princes of Powys, in their attempts to recover possession of their former dominions, and in predatory expeditions. During the reign of Alfred the Great of England, an army of marauding Danes, under the command of the celebrated piratical leader named Hasting, in 894, extended its ravages into this county, and advanced to the village of Buttington, the Butdigintune of the Saxon Chronicle, in the vicinity of the present town of Welshpool, where, receiving intelligence that an English army was approaching to oppose them, they intrenched themselves on both banks of the Severn. Ethelred, governor of Mercia, two other aldermen, and the king's thanes residing in the strong holds which he had erected, with the people summoned from the east of Pedridan, the west of Selwood, the east and north of the Thames, the west of the Severn, and some parts of North Wales, invested their camp for some weeks, and reduced them to such extremity that they were obliged to eat the flesh of their horses. Roused by their sufferings to furious action, the North-men made at last a desperate attempt to break from their prison, and, throwing themselves upon the Anglo-Saxons who formed the eastern part of the blockade, after a warm action, in which several royal thanes perished, the greater number achieved their escape, and hastened eastward to the coast of Essex without further molestation. The kingdom of Powys, after the Norman Conquest of England, became the principal object of attack to the foreign adventurers. One of these, named Baldwyn, swore fealty and did homage to the Conqueror for this part of Cambria, which he promised to secure by force of arms; and having partially accomplished his purpose, he erected a fortress at the present town of Montgomery, then called by the Welsh, after his name, Tré Valdwyn, or "Baldwyn's Town," from which the county derives the name, which it still bears in their language, of Sir Dré Valdwyn, or Swydd Dré Valdwyn. This castle must, however, have soon fallen into the possession of the Welsh, since Roger de Montgomery, who for his services had been created by the Conqueror Earl of Arundel and Shrewsbury, and had received a license to conquer from the Welsh to the west of the Severn, entered Powys-land a few years after with a powerful body of forces, and took the castle and town of Trê Valdwyn, which he fortified anew in his own right, and gave to it his own name of Montgomery, which it has ever since retained, and communicated to the county of which it is the ancient chief town.

A circumstance which facilitated the conquests of the Norman barons in this quarter was the subdivision of Powys between two of the descendants of Mervyn, son of Roderic the Great, into Powys-Vadoc and Powys-Gwenwynwyn, the former comprising the northern, and the latter the southern, parts of the original sovereignty: these again afterwards became divided among the descendants of those two princes. The year following the capture of Trê Valdwyn castle, the Welsh, mustering all their strength, retook it by a coup de main, plundered the town, and desolated the surrounding country. This castle was again repaired and strengthened by William Rufus, who, to put an end to the depredations committed by the Welsh forces under Gruffydd ab Cynan and the sons of Bleddyn ab Cynvyn, led an army into the marches, but was compelled to withdraw it with great loss, after throwing succours into Montgomery castle. The latter, on the retreat of the English, was immediately beleaguered by the Welsh, who, after a vigorous siege, at last took it by storm, and levelled it with the ground. The Norman arms soon afterwards again prevailed, and this castle was rebuilt by the Earl of Shrewsbury. In 1080, Gruffydd ab Cynan, laying claim to the throne of North Wales, and landing a large army of mercenaries in Pembrokeshire, was joined by Rhys ab Tewdwr, Prince of South Wales, and their confederated armies marched northward against Trahaiarn, the reigning prince of Gwynedd, whom they encountered on the hills of Carno, in this county, where they totally defeated his forces, and slew Trahaiarn himself, in a most sanguinary conflict. In the year 1191, in consequence of various depredations having been committed by the Welsh on the inhabitants of the marches, Hubert, Archbishop of Canterbury, in the absence of Richard I. in the Holy Land, besieged Castell Côch, now Powis Castle, near Welshpool, which he took after a vigorous resistance; and having left in it a strong garrison, he returned to England. This fortress was retaken by Gwenwynwyn, prince of this part of Powys-land, in 1197. That chieftain, disapproving of the conduct of the prince of Gwynedd, submitted to become a vassal to King John, and to hold his territories in capite of the English crown; and, after the succession of his son Gruffydd to the government, the last-mentioned fortress was taken and dismantled by Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, in the year 1233. Henry III., having rebuilt Montgomery castle, committed it to the custody of Hubert de Burgh; and, while in the possession of this governor, it was besieged by the Welsh, but relieved by an English army. A great number of Welsh, taken prisoners in one of their predatory excursions, having been put to death by the English, Llewelyn, Prince of North Wales, in retaliation, took and burned this fortress, putting the garrison to the sword. After repeated successes obtained by the Welsh in the great revolt under Owain Glyndwr, this chieftain, assembled the states of Wales at the town of Machynlleth, on the western border of the county; and by that assembly his title to the principality was solemnly acknowledged. During the civil war of the seventeenth century, Montgomery castle was garrisoned for the king by Lord Herbert of Chirbury, who, on the approach of the parliamentarians under Sir Thomas Myddelton, surrendered that fortress without opposition. In a short time, the royalist forces under Lord Byron approached Montgomery, and obliged the army under Sir Thomas Myddelton to make a precipitate retreat to Oswestry, leaving Lord Herbert, who had thus changed sides, with a slender and ill-provided garrison to defend the castle, the siege of which was immediately commenced by the royalists. Meanwhile the parliamentary army, being reinforced by troops under Sir William Brereton, Sir John Meldrum, and Sir Thomas Fairfax, marched back to the relief of this important post, though much less numerous than the royalist army, the latter amounting to about five thousand men, and the parliamentarians only to about three thousand. A general engagement ensued, in which the parliamentary forces at first gave way, but rallying with desperate valour, they at length gained a decisive and sanguinary victory, and the main body of the routed troops was pursued towards Shrewsbury. Lord Powis, on the breaking out of the civil war, had garrisoned Castell Côch, or Powis Castle, for the king; but it was taken by the parliamentarians under Sir Thomas Myddelton, in October 1644.

Montgomeryshire is partly in the diocese of St. Asaph, partly in that of Bangor, partly in that of Hereford, and partly in that of St. David's, the whole being included in the province of Canterbury: in the first it contains forty-one parishes, which are in the deaneries of Cede-wen, Cyfeiliog, and Poole, and in the archdeaconry of St. Asaph; in the second, seven parishes, which are in the deanery of Arustley, and archdeaconry of Merioneth; in the third, four parishes, which are in the deanery of Pontesbury, and archdeaconry of Salop; and in the last two parishes, which are in the deanery of Maelienydd Ultra Ithon, and archdeaconry of Brecknock: the total number of parishes is fifty-four, of which twenty-six are rectories, eighteen vicarages, and the rest perpetual curacies. For purposes of civil government it is divided into the nine hundreds of Cawrse, Deythur, Llanvyllin, Llanidloes, Machynlleth, Mathraval, Montgomery, Newtown, and Pool. It contains the boroughs and market towns of Montgomery, Llanidloes, Llanvyllin, Machynlleth, Newtown, and Welshpool; and the market town of Llanvair. One knight is returned to parliament for the shire, and one representative for the contributory boroughs; but, for many years prior to the passing of the late act for amending the representation of the people, the borough of Montgomery was the only one which exercised the elective franchise, all the rest, with the exception of Newtown, which is a newly created borough, having for some time discontinued to join in returning a member to parliament. The member for the county has hitherto been elected either at Montgomery or Machynlleth, according as the county court was to be held at either of these two places next after the issuing of the writ for that purpose. The polling-places in the election of a knight for the shire, according to the Boundary Act recently passed, are Montgomery, Llanidloes, Llanvair, Llan-vyllin, and Machynlleth. This county is included in the North Wales circuit: the assizes are held at Welshpool, and the general quarter sessions at Montgomery: the county gaol and house of correction are situated at Montgomery. There are thirty-seven acting magistrates. The rates raised in the county, for the year ending March 25th, 1829, amounted to £29,062; and the expenditure to £37,937, of which, £30,993 were applied to the relief of the poor.

A great portion of the county consists of wild and sterile mountains: the highest of these are in the south-western part of it, in a line extending from Pumlumon, or Plinlimmon, just within its south-western boundary, northward between Llanbrynmair and Carno, and by Llyn Gwyddior, into Merionethshire: this is the parting ridge between the rivers flowing eastward and those taking a contrary direction. The most extensive and fruitful vale is that which is traversed from south-west to north-east by the river Severn, which has its source in the southern part of this range, and as high as Llanidloes ceases to be a mountain torrent, taking its course thenceforward through a delightful valley, more like the extensive vales of England than those stripes of cultivation by which the mountains of Wales are generally intersected. Numerous villages lie scattered beneath the hills in this fertile district, and the deep banks of the river are successively adorned by the beautifully situated town of Newtown, and by numerous gentlemen's seats. Below Montgomery, which is situated a short distance eastward from the river, bending northward, the vale greatly expands in front of the isolated hills of Breiddin, while the river flows beneath the superb groves, lawns, and terraces of Powis Castle, and becomes navigable at Pool Quay, three miles below Welshpool. The valleys to the north of the Vale of Severn are much less extensive and fertile; those of the Vyrnwy and Tanat are fertile and highly picturesque, and are watered, the former by rivers descending from the parting ridge to the west, and the latter by streams descending from the Berwyn range of mountains, which, commencing near Chirk Castle, in Denbighshire, occupies the northern and north-western parts of this county in its course south-westward to the coast of Merionethshire. The Vale of the Dovey, which, occupying the westernmost part of the county, extends from north-east to south-west on the western side of the parting ridge, is distinguished for its fertility. The Plinlimmon, or southern range of mountains commences on the north-east, with the Breiddin hills, on the eastern side of the Severn, on the border of Shropshire, and includes the Long Mountain as far as Nant Cribba: hence it extends by Montgomery castle, along the Kerry hills (which occupy the south-eastern side of the county, and along the summit of which is carried the boundary line between Montgomeryshire and the counties of Salop and Radnor, and between North and South Wales), to the Llangurig mountains, and terminates in the naked summit of Plinlimmon, rising to the height of two thousand four hundred and sixty-three feet above the level of the sea: this is environed by various other heights of less elevation, of which the Biga mountains form a line of high table land on the northern side of the valley of the Severn, which is here somewhat narrow. In the Severn range, Breiddin hill rises to the height of nine hundred and ninety-nine feet above the level of the Severn; the Long mountain to that of one thousand three hundred and thirty feet above the level of the sea; and Llandinam mountain to that of one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight feet above the same level. Two others of the most distinguished summits, respectively called Moel y Golva and Cevn y Castell, form a group with Breiddin hill: the former, in the shape of a vast rugged cone, attains an elevation of one thousand one hundred and ninety-nine feet above the sea. Breiddin hill is crowned by a lofty obelisk, erected in commemoration of the naval victories of Admiral Lord Rodney. The general character of the Severn range is a regularity of outline, gradual slopes, and rounded summits, indicating the soft nature of the rocks of which the hills are composed; while its surface is uniformly covered with herbage, which supports numerous flocks of small sheep. The vegetable produce of the Berwyn range is fern and furze, or gorse, upon the lower and drier outskirts, heath upon the loftier summits, and rushes, with a variety of mosses and alpine aquatic plants, on the wet slopes and hollows. Many isolated hills and rocks rise in almost every part of Montgomeryshire that is not occupied by some of the principal ranges above mentioned: of these, the Carno mountains rise in a proudly pre-eminent group, nearly in the centre of the county. The narrow and rocky valleys generally have their sides adorned by hanging woods. In the western and south western districts are various small lakes, the sources of rapid streams. With regard to climate, the hills are particularly bleak, and are for the most part exposed to the full effects of cold easterly winds. In the narrow valleys the wind is frequently boisterous, but the climate is highly salubrious, and instances of longevity are numerous. Of the westerly winds, which prevail, on an average, during nine months of the year, the strongest are those which blow from the south-west and north-west: the north-west wind is here termed Gwynt y Creigiau, in allusion to the high mountains of Snowdon and the Arans, from which it rushes into this county: the easterly wind, which prevails during most of the other three months, is called Gwynt Cŏch y Mwythig, or the "red wind of Salop," as it effectually checks the verdure of spring, and converts the green blades into reddish husks.

The dry argillaceous mountains have generally a thin light peaty soil upon a substratum of hungry light mould, tinged yellow by oxyde of iron: the Berwyn range of mountains has upon its loftier summits a shallow peat resting upon clay or rammel, and, on springy slopes and hollows, various depths of peat. A ferny soil, or hazel mould, is common in different places, more particularly on the sides of the inferior hills, where it produces naturally fern, broom, and the larger ulex, or gorse, together with various kinds of underwood. The till, or hungry light soil, tinged as above mentioned with oxyde of iron, is also frequently found on the slopes of the smaller valleys. The narrow valleys, however, produce abundant vegetation of a more valuable kind, and are enlivened by rich corn-fields and meadows : these, more particularly in their higher recesses, and on their declivities having a southern aspect, frequently possess light soils, consisting of various admixtures of sandy loam, pebbles, broken shale, peat, &c. ; and in their lower levels, free loams, well adapted for the general purposes of tillage ; the last also abound in the greater part of the Vale of Severn, and in some parts of those of the Vyrnwy and Tanat. But the finest arable land in Montgomeryshire is on the eastern side of it, bordering on Shropshire, where agriculture is conducted on the more improved systems, and the management of land differs but little from that practised in the adjoining county of Salop : the soil here consists of strong loams, well adapted for the culture of wheat or for permanent pasture, which occupy the lower parts of the vales of Severn and Vyrnwy, with their outskirts. The soils of the eastern parts of the county, beyond a line drawn from the Llanymynech lime-works, at the south-eastern extremity of Denbighshire, south-westward by Guilsfield, Powis Castle, Nant Cribba, &c., to the border of Radnorshire, are of a brown colour.

The middle, western, and south-western parts of the county, owing to their elevated exposure and the ungenial nature of the soil, are unfavourable to the growth of corn ; so that only about sixty thousand acres of this county are under tillage, including about a third of the vale lands, which produce a considerable quantity of grain for exportation : fallowing is practised on the strong soils of the Vales of the Severn and Vyrnwy. The kind of corn formerly of most extensive cultivation was oats, but since the close of the last century it has been wheat ; great quantities of oats, however, are still grown, more especially on the uplands : the proportion of barley to the quantity of wheat is as three to four. Rye is occasionally though seldom cultivated, chiefly on the hills, where it is generally the first crop on the new enclosures after paring and burning. Wheat is most commonly cut with the reaping-hook, though sometimes with cradled scythes : oats and barley usually with naked scythes, and light crops of every species of grain are now frequently cut with the naked scythe, in preference to the more tedious mode with the sickle. Peas, which were formerly much grown in the valleys, are now cultivated only occasionally, and on a small scale : beans are scarcely ever seen. Turnips are commonly cultivated, as also are potatoes and mangel-wurzel, by the best farmers, on kindly soils. Hemp gardens, one of which was formerly attached to almost every cottage in the eastern part of the county, are now seldom seen. The most common artificial grass is red clover, to which trefoil and rye-grass are sometimes added. The quantity of productive grazing land is about one hundred and eighty thousand acres : those portions situated on the eastern side of the county are almost wholly appropriated to the dairy, much of the produce of which, both in butter and cheese, is sent to the markets of Shrewsbury, Chester, and Bridgenorth : the latter article is generally made like that of Cheshire, though sometimes like the Gloucester cheese : annatto is used to colour it in the lowlands, but seldom in the uplands. The principal object of the farmer, in the hilly districts, is the rearing of cattle to be fattened in more fertile parts of the island for places requiring a large supply : the Vales of Severn and Vyrnwy are almost the only districts in which the pastures are rich enough for fattening cattle. Meadows artificially irrigated are common in situations convenient for the purpose. Lime, as a manure, is carried to a distance of thirty or forty miles into this county from the Porthywaen and Llanymynech rocks, near its north-eastern confines : the stone itself, and coal for burning it, are also conveyed by the Montgomeryshire canal to Welshpool, Berriew, Newtown, and other places, where, on the wharfs, have been erected many kilns, which, when in full employ, produce from four to six hundred bushels of lime each per day. Among the agricultural implements, the "Lummas plough," a variety of the Rotherham plough, is the kind in common use, and is generally lock-ironed : the Scotch plough is also much used on level land. The cattle of the uplands are of the common small kind : in the vales they are of a larger and superior kind, and those reared in the Vales of Severn and Vyrnwy are much esteemed by the graziers. The native breed of the county is short-legged, and commonly of a red colour, with black faces ; but a kind which has of late years become very numerous in the Vale of Severn is long-legged, and of a light brown colour, except their faces, which are white : they are said to have been brought originally from Devonshire. The Herefordshire cattle, with white faces, are also becoming very common. The most remarkable breed of sheep is that peculiar to the Kerry hills, almost the only kind in North Wales which produces perfect wool, that of every other being more or less mixed with coarse long hairs, called by the manufacturers kemps. The characteristics of this breed, which is without horns, hardy, and comparatively tame, are, large woolly cheeks, white bunchy foreheads, white legs covered with wool, and a broad beaver-like tail : their whole form, however, falls short of compact symmetry : the average weight of their fleeces is one lb. and a half ; that of their carcasses, when fat, from ten to fourteen lb. per quarter : the Kerry hills, before their enclosure, under an act of parliament obtained in 1797, are said to have generally depastured in summer about twelve thousand of these sheep, besides horses and cattle. A black-faced and particularly fine-woolled race of sheep is bred upon the Long Mountain near Welshpool, and on the other hills, on the English border, stretching thence northward to Wrexham in Denbighshire. The other hilly parts of the county are occupied by the small ordinary kind of mountain sheep, which weigh from seven to twelve lb. per quarter, and yield fleeces weighing from three quarters of a lb. to one lb. and a half. These various breeds of sheep have in some instances been intermixed, and different varieties, from several parts of England have been introduced by individuals into the enclosed districts : among these the South Down sheep are the most numerous. In the hilly parts of Montgomeryshire, great numbers of very small and hardy ponies, commonly called merlins, breed promiscuously, and range the mountains untrained until they are three years old, when they are brought down for the first time, and driven to fairs like flocks of cattle or sheep : the place of sale generally exhibits a scene of great activity and violent exertion, since each that is purchased, though most likely never before touched by human hands, being immediately seized from among the untamed herd, displays all the restiveness of its natural ungovernableness. Numbers of these small animals are employed in their native districts, more particularly in conveying the produce of the manufactures of the county to the markets of Welshpool and Shrewsbury; and they are unrivalled in the agility with which they climb the slippery ascents of the mountains. There is also a breed rather larger than these, which are hardy, handsome, and active; and the vales of this county have long been noted for an excellent breed of horses, the superiority of which has been by some attributed to the introduction of some blood horses from Spain into this part of the country, by Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester; and by others, to the circumstance of a stud of horses having been kept by Queen Elizabeth at Park, near Caer-Sws, in the Vale of Severn. Many excellent draught horses, both for the coach and the waggon, are obtained from England. Orchards and gardens are numerous in the vale lands on the eastern side of the county, but all attempts profitably to establish the former in the more elevated regions have hitherto failed, the blossoms being seldom preserved from the effects of late frosts; and even should the trees escape the paralyzing effects of easterly winds, the cold and wet so frequently experienced during the summer months render the flavour of the fruit much less delicious than that ripened in more favourable aspects: in plentiful seasons a few farmers make cider or perry for their own consumption. Montgomeryshire has ever been distinguished for its woods, and it is still the best wooded county of North Wales, and one of the best in the island in proportion to its extent. Its timber, about a century ago, was so abundant that the fuel of a great part of the county consisted almost entirely of the best species, namely cleft. The first sale of timber from this county for the use of the navy was from Aber-tanat wood, on the confines of Shropshire, about the year 1730, and was followed, about 1750, by others from the woods of Powis Castle park, Aber Naint, and Trêv-Edryd; since which time Montgomeryshire has contributed annually to the supply of the navy and for building merchant vessels. About the year 1770, the size and quality of the Montgomeryshire oak were so well known and esteemed in the several dock yards, particularly those of Plymouth and Deptford, that a great competition arose among the buyers, which raised the price above that of timber of the same kind produced in almost any other part of the kingdom: this rivalry, however, subsided about the commencement of the present century. Owing to the constant demand upon this county, the extent of its woods gradually lessened until within the last thirty years, when planting, which before that period had been adopted by a few spirited individuals, first began to be practised on a large scale by many proprietors. There are several nursery gardens for forest trees in different places, and one more particularly extensive near Welshpool. The amount of waste lands has been greatly lessened by the four following enclosures: viz., that of Strata Marcella, Tîr y Myneich, and Deythur, or Deuddwr, amounting to about two thousand six hundred acres, under an act passed in 1788; that of Plâs Dinas and Mechain Iscoed, amounting to about five thousand acres, under an act passed in 1789; that of Cedewain, Hopetown, and Overgorddwr, amounting to about fifteen thousand acres, under an act obtained in 1796; and that of the Kerry hills, amounting to about twenty thousand acres, under an act passed in 1797. Before the allotment of these commons about one-half of the county was reckoned waste, and there yet remains nearly two hundred thousand acres of this description of land, notwithstanding that various other extensive wastes have since been enclosed, some by acts of parliament and others by common consent of the parties interested, such as the lordship of Arwystli, Mechain Uwchcoed, Llanvyllin, Caer Einion Uwchcoed, and Iscoed, and Teitrêv. Many of the unenclosed hills have a good depth of soil, and are covered with moss, fern, and grasses to their very summits; but the higher mountains, abounding with turf, can hardly be more advantageously applied than in depasturing in summer a hardy race of sheep, and affording fuel to a district where wood is scarce and coal very distant. As a great part of the low lands in the manors of Strata Marcella, Tîr y Myneich, and Deythur, above mentioned, was subject to frequent inundations by the sudden overflow of the rivers Severn and Vyrnwy, especially the former, a clause of the act for their enclosure enabled the commissioners to form embankments to keep the floods within proper bounds, which, with the whole enclosure, were completed at an expense of nearly £26,000. Commencing on the Severn a little below Pool Quay, they are continued to Cymmerau, at the junction of the two rivers, and thence extend for some miles along the course of the Vyrnwy towards Llanymynech: the banks have been repeatedly broken down in different places by flood waters descending with irresistible force from the mountains. The chief articles of fuel are, coal imported by the Montgomeryshire canal, and peat in the mountainous districts, where the former article cannot be conveniently procured: the quantity of wood burned as fuel is now very inconsiderable, and consists merely of the waste pieces and small branches.

The mineral productions of this county are various, but not of the first importance. The mountains are almost entirely composed of argillaceous schistus; but in those of the Berwyn chain are ranges of primitive rocks. Breiddin hill, however, is chiefly composed of greenish serpentine; and Moel y Golva, its south-western extremity, contains some burr for millstones; but a soft shale is the chief component of the whole of the Plinlimmon range, and of the hills as far north as the Vale of Vyrnwy, though in some places beds of a more compact and regularly stratified stone are found and quarried for flooring, gravestones, &c. Slates, for the roofs of houses and other buildings, are obtained only in the Berwyn range, chiefly at Llangynog, where there are two extensive quarries, from which about a million of slates are sold annually: those here raised are strong and durable, but quartzose veins pervading the whole rock from which they are obtained, they exhibit a coarser surface than others of a more homogeneous composition: the Llangynog slate resists the action of sulphuric acid for ten days: some slabs contain beautiful cubes of mundic. It is worthy of remark, that the strata of these quarries, and of the whole north-eastern part of the Berwyn range, dip eastward, while south-westward from the deep ravine called Bwlch sych, in the parish of Hirnant, about three miles to the south-west of Llangynog, they incline westward: the slate range extends in this direction by Llanwddyn, where quarries have been lately opened, to Dinasmowddwy, and other places more westward, in Merionethshire. The Plinlimmon mountains are not distinguished for either the abundance or the richness of their ores: lead-ore has been raised on the Berth-lwyd estate, near Llanidloes, and at Esgair hîr, on the border of Cardiganshire, near the copper mine called Esgair Vraith: this latter mine is called by early writers the "Welsh Potosi," and is on a north and south vein of sulphate of copper, which forms a tangent with the east and west lead vein of Esgair hîr. The largest mine in the county, however, is that in the Berwyn range at Llangynog, producing the species of lead-ore called galena, or potters' ore: its produce for many years during the early part of the last century was no less than four thousand tons annually. The vein, which extended from east by south to west by north, and was of great breadth, and one of the richest ever discovered in Britain, on being pursued eastward became quite barren; and, on the workmen following its dip westward, the work became inundated, and was consequently relinquished. Early in the present century this mine was let on lease by the proprietor, the Earl of Powis, to a company, who, at a great expense, drove a level beneath, and resumed the working of the original vein, which runs through a coarse argillaceous schistus. At Craig y Mwyn, near Pistyll Rhaiadr, to the north of Llangynog, is an ancient lead mine; and at Dylivau, to the west of Llanbrynmair, is a very considerable work of the same kind. Near the site of an ancient British smelting-hearth, at Dôl y Velin blwm, near Llanvyllin, numerous pieces of lead-ore have been found and collected by washers, to the amount of many tons. In an angle of this county, at Coedwae, on the border of Shropshire, coal is obtained from a few pits capable of producing about twelve tons per day: this is of a pleasant, though swift-burning kind, its inflammable carbon being combined with more maltha than bitumen. A small tract of dark-coloured argillaceous limestone extends in a south-westerly direction from its commencement in the Porthywaen limestone rocks into Powis Castle park: this kind of limestone is not burned. On Plinlimmon mountain is found granite; also the granitell of Kirwan, composed of quartz and shale; siliceous and schistose porphyry; and great quantities of pure quartz. Barytes, united with vitriolic acid, is found at Gallt y Maen, Llanwyddelan, and Llangynog.

Some of the most important manufactures of North Wales are carried on in Montgomeryshire, viz., those of flannels and webs, the pieces of which, displayed on the tenters, form a singular contrast with the verdure of the vales, through which is heard the monotonous sound of looms, fulling-mills, and other machinery. The flannel manufacture is confined to a district occupying the middle and southern parts of the county, which lie contiguous to the Severn and its contributory streams, from Llanidloes to Pool Quay, and to the Dovey and its contributory brooks from Dinasmowddwy to Machynlleth. Formerly the whole manufacture was performed manually by the farmers and cottagers in their own houses; but now they are aided by machinery, great numbers of carding and spinning machines having been erected on the different streams. Besides these, there are now also other manufactories on a larger scale at Newtown, Llanidloes, Machynlleth, Welshpool, &c., some of which employ about a hundred weavers. The Montgomeryshire flannels are seven-eighths of a yard wide, and each piece generally from one hundred to one hundred and sixty yards in length, though those of a finer sort are sometimes as much as two hundred and forty-two yards long. They are three times bleached under the hammers of the fulling-mill, the first time with urine, the second with fullers' earth, and the third with soap: the fullers' earth is brought by sea from London to Chester, and thence by inland navigation. The nap on these flannels is raised by carding, and by the adhesion of the several foldings when the pieces are laid in a particular manner for the purpose: its texture is particularly soft, owing to the quality of the wool of which they are composed, which renders them well adapted to be worn next the skin even of the most delicate invalid. The principal manufacturers are the wholesale venders of their own flannels; the farmers and cottagers, who still make them after the old method, were formerly universally accustomed to take each his own manufacture to meet the Shropshire and other drapers at the Welshpool flannel market, which is regularly kept every alternate Thursday throughout the year; but latterly the market at Newtown has increased so as almost to rival that of Welshpool, and a commodious market or flannel hall has been recently erected at the former place by subscription, under an expectation of securing the market to be held there, to the exclusion of Welshpool. The Rochdale "stoved white Welsh flannels" are very different from the real produce of the principality, having their warp sized in the weaving, and being afterwards stoved with brimstone: owing to their being drawn finer in the thread than the coarseness of the wool will admit of, they also generally appear threadbare, and the length of each piece never exceeds forty yards. One of the three districts in which are manufactured webs, or, as they are called by the London drapers, "Welsh plains," or "cottons," is the town of Machynlleth, with the Vale of the Dovey, in this county: the article is a coarse kind of thick white woollen cloth, made in pieces of from ninety to one hundred and twenty yards long, and seven-eighths of a yard broad, two of these pieces constituting a web. The webs of this county, as of that of Merioneth, are styled "strong cloth," to distinguish them from those of the Glyn district, near Oswestry, which are called "small cloth," because the pieces are about one-eighth of a yard narrower, though of the same length. The principal exports are, store cattle and sheep; raw wool, flannels, and webs; ores of lead and copper; oak bark for tanners; alder and birch bark for dyers; timber for the navy, and poles for the South Wales and Shropshire collieries; slates; grain, flour, and oatmeal; and butter and cheese. The chief imports are, coal, lime and limestone, and groceries and other ordinary shop goods.

The principal rivers are, the Severn, with its tributaries the Vyrnwy and the Tanat, all of which descend eastward from the mountain ridge running across the western part of the county; and the Dovey, or Dyvi, flowing westward from the same ridge: the romantic Wye also has its source on the southern side of Plinlimmon, in this county, and, pursuing a south-easterly course by Llangurig, soon enters Radnorshire. The

Severn rises in a powerful stream from a chalybeate spring on the eastern side of Plinlimmon, at the distance of about a mile from the source of the Wye, whence, as a mountain torrent, it descends eastward towards the town of Llanidloes, under the name of Havren, traversing the narrow valley called Glyn Havren. In this early part of its course it is joined by the streams of the Bâchwy and Glâslyn, all formed by the waters of the numerous springs dispersed in the surrounding mosses, and near Llanidloes it forms a junction with the Clywedog: at this place it loses the violence of its character, and, taking a north-easterly direction, flows through a broad and pleasant valley, by Newtown, and within one mile and a half of Montgomery, receiving the waters of the Miwl at Abermule, and of the Rhiw at Berriew, or Aber-Rhiw, besides smaller rivulets. From the latter place it takes a north-north-easterly course to Welshpool; and at Pool Quay, a little below that town, it becomes navigable, and, gradually assuming an easterly direction, flows onward in a deep bed until, on being joined from the north-west by the Vyrnwy, it enters the county of Salop. The Vyrnwy has its source in two branches rising in the parting ridge, one in the vicinity of Bwlch y Vedwen, near the confines of Merionethshire, which flows eastward by Llanvair, below which town it suddenly turns to the north-east, and enters the Vale of Meivod; and the other near Llanwddyn, which runs eastward till it meets the former branch at Mathraval: after this junction it is called the Vyrnwy, and pursues a north-eastern course until near the northern confines of the county, when it as suddenly assumes an easterly course, and, soon forming a confluence with the Tanat, becomes the north-eastern boundary of the county, and so continues to its junction with the Severn, first separating Montgomeryshire from a detached portion of Denbighshire, and afterwards from Shropshire: this river is navigable during several of the winter months as high as Llanymynech, and is particularly distinguished for the abundance, variety, and excellence of its fish, which reputation is also shared by its tributaries. The principal of these, the Tanat, which has its source in the Berwyn mountains, towards the northern extremity of the county, is joined, a little below the village of Llanrhaiadr-yn-Mochnant, by the small river Rhaiadr, which descends from the same mountainous district along the confines of Denbighshire, and forms the grand cataract of Pistyll Rhaiadr: the Tanat, at this confluence, becomes the northern boundary of the county, which it separates from Denbighshire, until, gradually bending eastward, it reaches the confines of Shropshire: here, on approaching Llanymynech, it suddenly turns southward to its confluence with the Vyrnwy, near Llandisilio, after having, for a few miles, bounded on the west a detached portion of Denbighshire. The Dovey, descending from the foot of Aran Mowddwy, a mountain of the Berwyn range in Merionethshire, flows by the town of Dinasmowddwy into the westernmost part of Montgomeryshire, which it crosses through a rich vale in a direction from north-east to south-west, passing by the town of Machynlleth, for a few miles above and below which it forms the western boundary of the county, which it wholly quits on being joined by a small stream from the heights around Plinlimmon.

The Montgomeryshire canal, which is a continuation of a branch of the Ellesmere canal to the Llanymynech lime-works, enters the county in crossing the Vyrnwy, by an aqueduct of five arches, each of forty feet span, and twenty-five feet above the level of the water in the river, besides a number of smaller flood arches: hence it proceeds along the Vale of the Severn to Welshpool, and thence by Berriew and Garthmill to Newtown, where it terminates. It was formed under the provisions of an act obtained in 1795; of a second, passed in 1815; and of a third, in 1821. Its total length is twenty-four miles; the number of locks is nineteen, of bridges fifty-five, and of aqueducts eight: it has two feeders, one from the Severn, and the other from the Tanat: a branch, three miles long, extends to the village of Guilsfield. The total expense of this canal was upwards of £125,000: the chief traffic upon it consists in the importation of limestone and coal, and the exportation of timber, grain, and the produce of the dairy. Strenuous and successful efforts have been made, since the commencement of the present century, in the improvement of the turnpike roads, to which an extent of nearly three hundred miles has been added; and at the same time, since the opening of the Montgomeryshire canal, the land carriage of lime, coal, and timber, has been greatly reduced in the parts adjacent to that line of communication, which have also the advantage of obtaining, by its means, materials of a more durable nature than any procured on the spot. The bridges are very numerous, and those in the more cultivated districts are generally very good ones, but those in the eastern and south-eastern parts of the county are constructed almost wholly of wood, and are frequently in bad repair. Several bridges of stone have lately been erected under the direction of the county surveyor, among which may more particularly be noticed those over the Severn, of three arches each, situated respectively at Llanidloes, Caer-Sws, and Newtown, and that over the Vyrnwy at Llanymynech. The road from London to Montgomery, Welshpool, Dôlgeley, Harlech, and Carnarvon, by way of Worcester, enters this county from Bishop's Castle in Shropshire, and passes through Montgomery, Welshpool, and Llanvair, to Mallwyd and Dinasmowddwy in Merionethshire: from Mallwyd, a branch of this road proceeds through Cemmes and Machynlleth, to Aberystwith. There are also separate roads from London to Montgomery and Welshpool, through Shrewsbury. From Welshpool a road is continued by Newtown and Llanidloes to the Devil's Bridge and Aberystwith: from Newtown a branch of this road proceeds through Llanwnnog and near Llanbryn-mair to the Machynlleth road near the village of Cemmes; and from Welshpool, one by Llanvillin to Bala in Merionethshire.

The only remains of encampments and fortifications decidedly Roman are at Caer-Sws, the Gaer near Montgomery, and Mathraval, each being quadrangular, where also various minor relics of the Romans have been found. At Cwm-glân-Avon, near Llangynog, are the remains of a very ancient building, fourteen yards long and seven broad, called Cubil, supposed to have been a smelting furnace, perhaps of Roman construction, as there are several extensive mining levels of unknown antiquity in the vicinity, and great quantities of scoria lie adjoining to it. The Via Devana entered this county from a station at Castell Collwyn, in Radnorshire, and, taking its course northward by Caer-Sws, is still visible beyond the latter place in the parishes of Aberhavesp, Trêgynon, Llanwyddelan, Llanlligan, Llanvair, and Llanervul. The other Roman road which crossed this county entered it from Shropshire, near the village of Llandrinio, in the vicinity of which, at a place called Street, it is plainly visible: at Mediolanum it crossed the Via Devana, and thence proceeded by Llangynog and Trûm y Sarn into Merionethshire. A vicinal way branched from the Via Occidentalis at Pennal, near Machynlleth, just beyond the western boundary of the county, by Caer-Sws: it is visible between Newtown and Welshpool, in a direction towards the great Roman camp called the Gaer, near Montgomery. From Caer-Sws to Meivod ran the vicinal road now called Sarn Swsan, vestiges of which may be traced from the former place, by Gwyn-vynydd, as far as the banks of the Vyrnwy, near Llŷsyn: by Dr. Worthington it was traced to Street Vawr, near Coed y Clawdd, in the parish of Llanrhaiadr-yn-Mochnant, on the northern border of the county; and thence it crossed Rhôs y Brithdir to Pen y Street, and passed through Llam-iwrch to Caer-Vâch, a small Roman camp, in its further course towards Chester. The line of demarcation raised by Offa, between his dominions and those of the Welsh, is still called by the English "Offa's Dyke," and by the Welsh Clawdd Offa, and may be traced along nearly the whole of its course through this county. It enters it from the south, at Pwll y Piod, on the road between Bishop's Castle and Newtown, and thence proceeds near Mellington Hall, by Brompton mill and Lymore Park, near Montgomery, and by Forden Heath, Nant-cribba, Leighton Hall, and Buttington church: here it is lost for five miles, the channel of the Severn probably serving for that space as a continuation of this famous boundary, which, however, again appears just below the influx of the small stream called Bele into the Severn, on the northern side of the latter river, whence it is continued by the churches of Llandisilio and Llanymynech, to the edge of the vast precipitous limestone rock in the latter parish, and thence across the north-western part of Shropshire into Denbighshire. It consists of a vast ditch and rampart, the latter being on the English side: in its vicinity, near Mellington Hall, is an encampment called Caer-ddin; at Brompton mill, a mount; and at Nant-cribba, another ancient fortification. On the summit of a high mountain, near the village of Llandinam, is a strong British camp; and various intrenchments, supposed to have had some relation to the castle of Mathraval, the seat of the princes of Powys, and the foundations of which may yet be traced, lie scattered in the vicinity of Meivod. There is also a British camp, called Gardden, of a circular form, on a hill near Llanvair, and another near Llanervul: the remains of a third may be seen at Castell Caereineon. Near Cann Office, on the road between Llanvair and Mallwyd, is a tumulus seventy yards in circumference. On each of the two summits of Plinlimmon is a carnedd, or large heap of stones: other monuments of the same kind are very numerous in the parishes of Llanervul and Llangadvan, where the largest are from thirty to sixty yards in circumference; these are sepulchral. On a hill called Pencoed, in the last-mentioned parish, are numerous small hollows and hillocks, supposed to be places of interment of the Britons. At the period of the Reformation there were, at Llanlligan, a Cistercian nunnery, and at Ystrad Marchell, or Strata Marcella, a Cistercian abbey. The most remarkable specimens of ecclesiastical architecture are seen in the churches of Montgomery, Llanidloes, Newtown, and Llanwnnog. The castles of Powis and Montgomery, the latter of which is in ruins, are striking specimens of the fortifications raised by the Anglo-Normans to secure their conquests from the native Welsh: there are also remains of that of Dôlvorwyn, near Newtown. Powis Castle is the venerable mansion of Viscount Clive, eldest son of the Earl of Powis, and, being built of red calcareous stone quarried out of the adjoining park, is called by the Welsh Castell Côch, or the "Red Castle." Among residences of a more modern date those most worthy of notice are, Aberiarth Hall, near Machynlleth, belonging to Sir T. D. King, Bart.; Black Hall, near Newtown, the seat of Charles Jones, Esq.; Bôd-Heilyn, that of J. Humphreys, Esq.; Bôdvâch, near Llanvyllin, belonging to Lord Mostyn; Broadway, near Montgomery, the seat of Sir C. T. Jones, Knt.; Bronhyddon, near Llanvyllin, that of Robert Perrott, Esq.; Brynaber, also near Llanvyllin, that of M. Bibbey, Esq.; Bryngwyn, near Llanvyllin, that of M. Williams, Esq.; Brynllwarch, near Newtown, that of W. Pugh, Esq.; Cyvronydd, near Welshpool, that of P. Jones, Esq.; Dôlerw, near Newtown, that of W. Lutener, Esq.; Dôl-llys, near Llanidloes, that of George Meares, Esq.; Dôlvorgan, near Newtown, that of John Edwards, Esq.; Dôlvorwyn Hall, near Newtown, that of the Rev. J. Pryce; Diserth, near Welshpool, that of J. D. Corrie, Esq.; Garth, near the same town, that of R. Mytton, Esq.; Upper Garthmyl, that of C. Jones, Esq.; Lower Garthmyl, that of — Johnes, Esq., M. D.; Glandulas, near Llanidloes, that of William Owen, Esq.; Glandwr, near the same town, that of B. Woosnam, Esq.; Glân Severn, near Welshpool, that of William Owen, Esq.; Glasgoed, near Llanvyllin, that of D. Evans, Esq.; Glân Havren, near Newtown, that of Mrs. Herbert; Glyn Severn, near Llanidloes, that of I. Hunter, Esq.; Greenfields, near Machynlleth, that of Col. Edwards; Gregynog, near Newtown, that of C. H. Tracy, Esq.; the Gro, near the same town, that of the Rev. C. Wingfield; Leighton Hall, near Welshpool, that of Panton Corbett, Esq.; Llanerchydôl, near the same town, that of David Pugh, Esq.; Llwydiarth Hall, near Llanvyllin, belonging to Sir W. W. Wynn, Bart.; Llwyn, near the same town, the seat of W. Humphreys, Esq.; Lymore Park, near Montgomery, belonging to Viscount Clive; Mellington Hall, near the same town, the seat of T. B. Browne, Esq.; Nantcribba, near Welshpool, belonging to Viscount Hereford; Newtown Hall, near Newtown, the seat of the Rev. G. A. Evors; Penbrÿn, near Montgomery, that of Thomas Jones, Esq.; Pennant, near Berriew, that of J. B. Williams, Esq.; Pentre Nant, near Montgomery, that of W. Morris, Esq.; Pen y lan, at Meivod, that of I. Mytton, Esq.; Rhiwport, at Berriew, that of W. Jones, Esq.; Trelydan Hall, near Welshpool, that of J. C. Jukes, Esq.; Vaynor Park, at Berriew, that of Mrs. Winder; and Vronvelen, near Machynlleth, that of D. P. Evans, Esq. In those parts of Montgomeryshire where the hills consist almost wholly of shale, the houses of the gentry were formerly built of massive timber, and now most commonly of brick, made from clay found in the valleys. The ordinary houses in such districts are generally of timber, wattle or lath, and plaster; and the roofs chiefly slated, though sometimes of shingles, or oak, split and cut into the form of slates. There are many farm-houses and offices upon new and improved constructions. The cottages in the greater part of the county have a very wretched appearance, and consist only of two small rooms. On the schistose hills, and in their vicinity, where there is an abundance of flattish stones, the fences are frequently dry stone walls: hawthorn sets, for hedges, are grown in great quantities by the nurserymen. The farmers in the low lands excel in their family fare; but in the mountainous districts the bread has generally a large proportion of rye or barley, and cakes made wholly from oatmeal are much used. Servants hired by the year generally commence their term of service on the 1st of May. There are several springs, the waters of which contain a large proportion of hepatic air: two of these are in the parish of Meivod, where also there is one extremely limpid, the waters of which have been found efficacious in the cure of scrophulous and other ulcers. Two saline and sulphureous springs have been lately discovered in the parish of Llanvair, which have been much frequented during the last few summers, many having derived considerable benefit from drinking the waters. Near the church of Llanervul is a well, called Fynnon Ervul, famous for its medicinal virtues; and one adjoining the church of Garthbeibio, called Fynnon Dydecho, which is constructed so as to form a cold bath, its waters being reputed to have some efficacy in the cure of rheumatic affections. The small river Rhaiadr, about four miles from the village of Llanrhaidr, on the northern border of the county, after sliding gently down a small declivity, precipitates itself over a perpendicular rock upwards of two hundred feet in height, and then forms a second cataract as its raging waters fall into a small natural basin beneath: this grand cascade is called Pistyll Rhaiadr.

MOOR, a township in the parish of HAWARDEN, hundred of MOLD, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES,  $1\frac{3}{4}$  mile (N.N.E.) from Hawarden, containing 132 inhabitants.

MORDRYDD, a hamlet in the parish of LLANSPYTHID, hundred of DEVYNOC, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S.W.) from Brecknock, containing 160 inhabitants. It is situated in the upper part of the vale of the river Tarrell, which separates it from the parish of Llanvaes, and at the northern declivity of the Green Mountain. At some distance to the south, and partly within this hamlet, rise the rocky and elevated conical mountains called the Brecknockshire Beacons, to the height of two thousand eight hundred and sixty-two feet above the level of the sea. The Calvinistic Methodists have a small place of worship here. Gilbert Court, an old mansion built by some member of the family of Parry, in the reign of Elizabeth, near the southern bank of the Tarrell, is now a farm-house in this hamlet, in which is also situated Bôlgoed, which formed part of the estate conferred by Bernard Newmarch on his follower Sir John Skule. Not a vestige of the mansion occupied by this knight is now visible; but on a farm called Cilwhibarth there is a large mound or barrow, which Mr. Jones is of opinion was the "mons placitorum" of the manor. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £120. 2.

MORETON (ABOVE), a township in the parish of RUABON, hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (N. by E.) from Ruabon, containing, with the township of Moreton Below, 2957 inhabitants. It is rich in mineral productions, abounding both with iron-ore and coal, the working of which affords employment to a great majority of the population, which has increased one-tenth since the census of 1821.

MORETON (BELOW), a township in the parish of RUABON, hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (N.E.) from Ruabon. The population is included in the return for Moreton Above. Numerous respectable and pleasing residences are observable in various directions, among which Moreton Hall is most prominently conspicuous.

MORRISTON, a chapelry in the parish and hundred of LLANGYVELACH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (N. by E.) from Swansea. The population, which is very considerable, is returned with that of the hamlet of Lower Clàs, in which it is situated. This village, which is of recent origin, derives its name from its founder and late proprietor, Sir John Morris, who built it for the residence of the persons engaged in the various copper-works and collieries in this district. It is pleasantly situated on the western bank of the river Tawy, which is here navigable for sloops of small burden, and which, falling into the harbour of Swansea, affords a facility for the conveyance of its mineral produce to that port, which is further aided by the Swansea canal passing close to the village. The different ranges of building are formed with great regularity, after a plan by Mr. W. Edwards, designed about the year 1768, with a view to the formation of regular streets, in the probable event of its ultimately becoming a town, from the future extension of the works, and the advantages of its situation in the heart of an extensive district abounding with mineral wealth, and on the bank of a navigable river near the sea-port of Swansea. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, and in the patronage of Sir John Morris. The chapel is a neat structure, and is appropriately fitted up. There are places of worship for Independents and for Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. A school has been established in the village, and is supported by the proprietors of the different copper-works and collieries in the neighbourhood, for the gratuitous instruction of the children of the persons employed in their works. This chapelry is now included within the new boundaries of the contributory borough of Swansea, under the late Reform Act.

MORVIL, a parish in the hundred of KEMMES, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (S.E.) from Fishguard, containing 201 inhabitants. This place is distinguished in the historical annals of the principality for the gallant resistance opposed by the Welsh to the encroachments of a party of Norman invaders, who in the latter part of the eleventh century, under the sanction of the reigning monarch, landed on the coast of Pembroke, with a view to establish themselves in such territories as they could obtain by conquest in this part of the principality. The parish is situated in the northern portion of the county, near the western declivity of the Precelly mountain, and is bounded on the south by a rivulet, which, flowing westward, falls into the river Cleddy. The surrounding scenery is not distinguished by any peculiarity of features from that which prevails generally in this part of the principality; but the views, though not extensive, are interesting from the majestic appearance of the mountains by which the parish is nearly surrounded. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £2, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Sir R. B. P. Philipps, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. John the Baptist. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £49. 9.

MOTHEVEY (MYDDVAI), a parish, comprising the Upper and Lower divisions, in the higher division of the hundred of PERVETH, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (S.) from Llandovery, and containing 1192 inhabitants, of which number, 550 are in the Upper, and 642 in the Lower, division. This parish is situated on the turnpike road leading from Llandilo, through Llangadock to Llandovery, and is watered by the rivers Towy, Rhythan, Gwytherig, Sevin, Clydach, Brân, and Usk, which last river is said to have its source among the Black Mountains within its limits. The surface is boldly undulated, and in some parts hilly and even mountainous: the lands, with the exception of a considerable portion of rocky and sterile ground, are enclosed and in a high state of cultivation, those in the lower grounds being extremely fertile, and consisting of many well-wooded enclosures; and the scenery, which is strikingly diversified, is characterized by features of picturesque beauty and romantic grandeur. The luxuriant richness of the vales is finely contrasted with the rugged barrenness of the mountains; and the numerous rivers that flow through the lower grounds add greatly to the beauty of the scenery, which is further enlivened by the several gentlemen's seats which are scattered over the parish. Kilgwyn, the seat of James Price Gwynne Holford, Esq., is an elegant and spacious mansion, beautifully situated on the banks of the river Sevin, and comprehending within the grounds, which are tastefully laid out, a rich variety of interesting scenery. Llwynywormwood, the mansion of John G. H. G. Williams, Esq., is also a handsome residence, pleasantly situated higher up on the same stream, and commanding some interesting prospects. A small woollen manufacture is carried on in the village; and there are two king's mills in the parish, Kilgwyn and Brân, each of which pays a chief-rent of £2 to the lord of the manor, to whom also is paid a fee of ten shillings on the marriage of every freeholder, in lieu of the uncivilized feudal custom of a first night's lodging with the bride: a fair is held in the village on the 18th of October. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. 6. 8., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church is dedicated to St. Michael, from which circumstance the parish is sometimes called "Llanvihangel Myddvai:" it is an ancient structure, situated in a vale at the foot of the mountainous district in the eastern part of the parish, but not distinguished by any architectural details of importance. In the chancel is a stone to the memory of Dr. Morgan Owen, who was buried here; he was promoted to the see of Llandaf in 1639, and died in 1644: and in the churchyard are, an ancient yew tree, twenty-five feet, and a sycamore, fifty-four feet, in girth. There was formerly a chapel of ease at Dôl Hywel, which is now in ruins. From the parish register, which was formerly kept in the Latin language, it appears that, during the usurpation of Cromwell, all the marriages at this place were solemnized by John Powell, Esq. There are two places of worship for Independents, and one for Calvinistic Methodists. A National school, in which about fifty children of both sexes receive gratuitous instruction, is supported by subscription. Dr. Owen, Bishop of Llandaf, bequeathed £10 per annum, payable out of the tithes of this parish, for the relief of poor persons not receiving parochial aid: after some litigation the sum of £238. 18. 5. was awarded by a decree of the court of Chancery, in 1709, as arrears due to the parish, which sum is now invested, in the name of the churchwardens, in the Old South Sea Annuities; and an unknown benefactor bequeathed a sum of money, the interest of which, amounting to £6. 7. 5., is annually distributed among the poor. Some interesting remains, supposed to be of British and Saxon origin, are said to have been found on a farm called Pen-tŵyn by the late John Josiah Holford, Esq.; and in the year 1807, thirty small silver coins were found near the ruins of Dôl Hywel chapel. In a field not far from the vicarage-house, called Monks' Field, are two tumuli. In the mountainous district is Craig Cwm Clyd, a rock nearly sixty yards in perpendicular height. During the thirteenth century this place was much frequented by physicians; among whom was Rhiwallon, who, in conjunction with his three sons, during his residence here, distinguished himself by a manuscript treatise on the practice of physic, which is preserved among the Welsh manuscripts in the library of the Welsh charity school in London. Tradition affirms that his descendants continued to follow the practice of medicine at this place till within the memory of persons living at the beginning of the present century. The poor are maintained by an average annual expenditure amounting to £342. 19.

MOUGHTREY (MÔCH-DRÊ), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of MONTGOMERY, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (S. W.) from Newtown, containing 544 inhabitants. It constituted formerly, with the parish of Kerry, a district in the ancient province of Ferregs, granted by Elystan Glodryd, lord of Ferregs and Maelienydd, to his second son Morgeneu. It is situated in the southern part of the county, bordering upon Radnorshire, and comprises a large tract of land, of which one-half is enclosed and cultivated, and the remainder allotted as sheepwalks to the several farms, under the provisions of the Kerry enclosure act, passed in 1797. The surface is boldly undulated, rising in several parts into abrupt eminences, and surrounded by lofty hills, which circumscribe the parish in the form of an amphitheatre. In the mountains are many singular chasms, and the whole surface of the hills was formerly richly wooded: the surrounding scenery is in many points highly picturesque, and the views, though partially obstructed by intervening heights, comprehend many interesting objects. The manufacture of flannel is carried on upon a limited scale, affording employment to a portion of the inhabitants. This parish formed one of the twenty-four prebends with which Thomas Beck, Bishop of St. David's, in 1287, endowed the college of St. Mary at Aberguilly, in the county of Carmarthen, and which were afterwards transferred by Henry VIII. to the college of Christ Church in Brecknock: the prebend is valued in the king's books at £1. 7. 1., and is in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Archdeacon of Brecknock. Moughtrey and Kerry are the only parishes in the county of Montgomery which are within the diocese of St. David's, a circumstance which is attributed to the successful resistance opposed by the celebrated Giraldus Cambrensis, Archdeacon of Brecknock, to the forcible attempts of the then Bishop of St. Asaph to take possession of those churches, and annex them to his diocese. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture, but in a very dilapidated condition: it stands in a vale watered by a stream which falls into the river Severn. There is a place of worship for Independents. On a point of land between two small brooks, near a hill in this parish, called the Craig, there is a strong military station of small extent; and near Craig Mill are evident traces of a Roman road leading across the summit of the hills, from Caer-Sws to Abbey Cwm Hir, in the county of Radnor. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £278. 14.

MOUNT (MOEL Y MWNT), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of TROEDYRAUR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 3½ miles (N.) from Cardigan, containing 131 inhabitants, who are exclusively employed in agriculture. This parish, which is situated at the south-western extremity of the county, and on the shore of Cardigan bay, derives its name from a lofty hill of conical form near the church. At the base of this hill is a large sand bank, covering a great number of human bones, which are occasionally visible when the sand is scattered by the wind, and are supposed to be the remains of a body of Flemings, who, having effected a landing on this part of the coast, were encountered by the natives, and repulsed with great slaughter. The surrounding scenery is destitute of beauty, and the only views possessing any interest are those up the Vale of Teivy, and those extending over the bay, which is occasionally enlivened by the passing of vessels. The coast is here very bold and precipitous, and the sounding within a short distance of the land is from four to seventeen fathoms. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Impropiator of the tithes. The church, dedicated to the Holy Cross, and situated near the sea, is an ancient edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, but is not distinguished by any architectural details. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £32. 3.

MOUNTON, or MONKTON, a parish in the hundred of NARBERTH, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (W. S. W.) from Narberth, containing 41 inhabitants. This place, which is situated in the south-eastern part of the county, and near the source of a small rivulet which flows into the eastern Cleddy, is but of small extent. The parish comprises a large portion of woodland, called Canaston wood, together with some good arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and cultivated. The living is consolidated with the rectory of Narberth, to which the church is now considered a chapel of ease, and is in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £8. 9.

MOYLGROVE, a parish in the hundred of KEMMES, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (W. by S.) from Cardigan, containing 419 inhabitants. This parish, which by the Welsh is called "Trêv Gwyddel," is situated on the coast in the north-eastern part of the county, and comprises a moderate extent of arable and pasture land, which is all enclosed and cultivated. The surrounding scenery is not characterized by any peculiar features, and the views over the adjacent country are barren of interest: in general the shore is abrupt and rugged, with a good depth of water. The living is a discharged vicarage, annexed to that of Bayvill, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty. The church, dedicated to St. Andrew, is about half a mile from the village, being situated on the left bank of a stream which falls into St. George's channel at no great distance: it is not remarkable for any architectural details. There is a place of worship for Independents. Within the limits of the parish is a well, the water of which is considered efficacious in several diseases. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £122. 17.

MYDDVAY (MYDDVAI), a joint hamlet with Trê-Clâs, in the parish of LLANARTHNEY, hundred of ISCENEN, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES. The population is included in the return for the parish.

MYDRIM (MEIDRUM), a parish partly in the hundred of ELVET, but chiefly in the higher division of the hundred of DERLLÛs, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (W.) from Carmarthen, containing 983 inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated in the western part of the county, and is intersected by two small rivers, called the Avon Gynin and Dewi Vawr, which, uniting to the south of it, fall into the river Tâf at St. Clear's: it comprises but a moderate portion of arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, being enlivened by the course of the rivers which flow through the parish, in a direction from north to south; and the views over the adjacent country are interesting and extensive. About a mile from the church is Penrheol the residence of Mrs. Howel, a handsome mansion agreeably situated in grounds tastefully laid out; and other pleasing and ornamental residences are scattered over the parish. Coal has been supposed to exist here, and an attempt to procure it has been made with good prospect of success. A fair is held on March 12th. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Llanvihangel Abercowin annexed, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £7. 10., endowed with £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. David, is an ancient edifice, not distinguished by any architectural details. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic Methodists. The annual sum of £8 is paid out of the tithes towards the support of a school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children; but the name of the benefactor is not known. Here are the remains of an ancient earthwork, called Castell Brynule: it extends over an area of two acres, and is defended by a single rampart. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £347. 18.

MYHATHAM, a joint hamlet with Trêvreyan, in the parish of LLANARTHNEY, hundred of ISCENNEN, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES. The population is included in the return for the parish.

MYNACHDU (MYNACHDY), a hamlet in that part of the parish of LLANYCRWYS which is in the higher division of the hundred of CAYO, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (W.) from Lampeter, containing 148 inhabitants. From the name, which signifies a monastery, it is probable that a cell to some ancient abbey was formerly situated here. Slight traces of a Roman road, which passed from Llanio to Llanvair ar y brÿn, are still discernible in the vicinity.

MYNACHLOGDŪ (MONACHLOG-DŪ), a parish in the hundred of KEMMES, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 10 miles (N. by E.) from Narberth, containing 447 inhabitants, which is the exact number returned ten years previously, in the census of 1821. This parish is situated near the eastern extremity of the county, bordering upon Carmarthenshire, and comprises a large extent of land, of which a great portion is occupied by the Precelly mountain, but the remainder is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation: the river called the Eastern Cleddy has its source within its limits. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Sir R. B. P. Philipps, Bart. The church, dedicated to St. Dogmael, is not remarkable for any architectural details. The average annual expenditure for the relief of the poor is £92. 6.

MYNWERE (MINWEAR), a parish in the hundred of NARBERTH, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. by S.) from Narberth, containing 161 inhabitants. This parish, from a mistaken etymology of its name, which was read Mwyn Aur, signifying "a gold mine," was supposed to have contained gold-ore, and some fruitless attempts were in consequence made to discover it. The name is, however, with greater probability, supposed to be derived from a weir on the Eastern Cleddy, on the banks of which river the parish is situated, which was noted for the abundance of fish taken there during the season. The parish comprises a moderate portion of arable and pasture land, which is all enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified with wood and water, there being an extensive plantation on the north-eastern boundary of the parish; and the views over the adjacent country are not destitute of interest. Picton Castle, with its rich and well-wooded grounds, appears to much advantage on the other side of the Cleddy, together with Slebech Hall and its demesne. The living is a vicarage not in charge, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Hon. Baron de Rutzen, of Slebech Hall. The church is dedicated to St. Wonan. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £45. 13.

N.

NANGLE, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES.—See ANGLE.

NANNERCH, a parish partly in the Caerwys division of the hundred of RHUDDLAN, county of FLINT, and partly in the hundred of RUTHIN, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (S. by W.) from Holywell, containing 384 inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated in the central part of the county, bordering upon Denbighshire, near the source of the river Whieler, and on the turnpike road leading from Denbigh to Mold. The surface is strikingly undulated, rising into bold and abrupt eminences in various parts; and the lands, which are principally arable, with a proportion of meadow and pasture land, are in a good state of cultivation: the soil is principally gravelly, and well adapted to the growth of corn. Some very extensive veins of rich iron-ore are found in the township of Penbedw, where are also lead mines, which have been worked for many years with considerable success. The surrounding country is boldly varied, affording pleasing views, and displaying some fine specimens of mountain scenery. Within the parish are some fine springs, of which one, called "Fynnon Sarah," near the new turnpike road, is considered to be the source of the river Whieler, which, after pursuing a westerly course, falls into the river Clwyd near Pontrufydd. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £9. 8.  $1\frac{1}{2}$ ., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a neat plain structure: it contains a very handsome monument to the memory of the family of Mostyn of Penbedw, and a mural monument to that of Watkin Williams, Esq., of the same place, who represented the Flintshire boroughs in forty successive parliaments, and died November 30th, 1808, aged sixty-six. At Cwm, near the village, there is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists, erected in 1830. A parochial school, in which twenty boys and twenty girls receive gratuitous instruction, is supported by subscription. John Edwards, in 1734, bequeathed a rent-charge of £1. 6. to be annually distributed in bread among the poor. Near the boundary of the parish is Moel Arthur, a very extensive British encampment, occupying the summit of a lofty eminence; and near it are the remains of Pen y Cloddiau, the most extensive British fortification in this part of the principality: they are both situated on the range of the Clwydian mountains, within the limits of the parish. Many rare and valuable fossils are found in the lead mines here. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £218. 2.

NANT, a joint township with Prestatyn, in the parish of MELIDEN, hundred of PRESTATYN, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (N. N. E.) from St. Asaph. The population is included in the return for the parish. It is situated on the coast of the Irish sea, where the beach is formed of firm sand, and there are about two fathoms of water half a mile from the shore.

NANTCWNLLE (NANT-GYNLLO), a parish, partly in the upper division of the hundred of MOYTHEN, and partly in the lower division of the hundred of PENARTH, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (N.) from Lampeter, containing 686 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from a small brook which flows into the river Aëron, by which it is intersected, and from the dedication of its church to St. Cynllo, an eminent British saint, who flourished about the middle of the fifth century. The river Aëron here forms a boundary between the hundreds of Moythen and Penarth: the vale through which it flows abounds with pleasingly varied scenery, and the views over the surrounding country combine many objects of interest. The parish constitutes a prebend in the collegiate church of Brecknock, valued in the king's books at £7. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £3. 13. 4., endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The tithes are divided between the prebendary and the vicar, the former of whom has two-thirds, and the latter one-third. The church, dedicated to St. Cynllo, is a small plain edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, and is not distinguished by any architectural details of importance. There are some remains of an ancient intrenchment, called "Pen y Gaer." The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £110. 10.

NANTDŪ (NANT-DŪ), a chapelry in the upper division of the parish of CANTREF, hundred of PENCELLE, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 10 miles (S. S. W.) from Brecknock, containing, with the hamlet of Hepstè, 102 inhabitants. It is situated on the eastern bank of the Tâf Mawr, or Greater Tâf, at the southern extremity of the parish, through which passes the turnpike road from Brecknock to Merthyr-Tydvil, and between which and the northern part of the parish, where stands the mother church, extends part of a long chain of lofty barren mountains, including the Brecknockshire Beacons, one of which is the highest in South Wales. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rector of Cantref. An overseer is appointed for this division of the parish, though the inhabitants of both unite in the maintenance of the poor.

NANTGLYN (NANT-GLYN), a parish in the hundred of ISALED, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (S. W.) from Denbigh, containing 345 inhabitants. This parish, which is pleasantly situated on a branch of the river Clwyd, nearly in the centre of the county, extends almost seven miles in length, and four miles and a half in breadth, and comprises a large tract of land, of which comparatively but a small portion is enclosed and cultivated. The surrounding scenery is agreeably diversified, though not distinguished by any striking peculiarity of feature; and the views, though confined towards the south and the west by lofty hills, are not destitute of interest. Fairs are held on May 6th and October 27th. The living is a discharged vicarage, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese, of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £4. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. James, is not marked by any architectural details of importance. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. A parochial school, in which children of both sexes are gratuitously instructed, is supported by subscription. Some small benefactions in land and money, amounting together to only an inconsiderable sum, are annually distributed among the poor. Mr. David Samuel, who sailed with Captain Cook, as surgeon in the ship "Discovery," and was an eye witness of his death, of which he wrote an interesting narrative, printed in the Biographia Britannica, was a native of this place; and the late Mrs. Jordan, the celebrated actress, was born at Plâs, a township in this parish. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £117. 5.

NANTMEL (NANT-MAEL), a parish in the hundred of RHAIDR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 3½ miles (E. S. E.) from Rhaiadr, containing 1294 inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated on the small river Dulas, and the turnpike road from Rhaiadr to New Radnor passes through it. It extends for nearly eight miles in length and five in breadth, and comprises a large tract of good arable and pasture land, of which by far the greater portion is enclosed and cultivated. The surrounding scenery is agreeably diversified, and that part of the parish through which the road from New Radnor to Rhaiadr passes is pleasingly picturesque, the vale being on one side finely wooded. The banks of the small river Dulas are in some parts ornamented with features of pleasing character; and a fine sheet of water, called Llyn Gwyn, one mile in circumference, and abounding with carp and eels, adds greatly to the beauty of the scenery. Llwynbarried, the property of — Evans, Esq., and another seat, belonging to — Chapman, Esq., are in this parish. The living is a vicarage, with Llanyre annexed, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £11. 17. 6., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Cynllo, and situated under a steep bank above the turnpike road, was rebuilt in the year 1792: it is a neat edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, with an embattled tower, which forms an interesting object from several points of view. There are places of worship for Baptists at Dolau, and for Independents at Cwrtgwyn. A farm in this parish, called Penfynnon, is charged with the annual payment of £5 to the poor, under the will of Hugh Philips; and a small donation of land for the same purpose was bequeathed by John Davis, in 1718. Two of the largest carneddau in the county are situated in this parish, one occupying the summit of Gwastedyn, and the other that of Camlo hill. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £626. 9.

NANTMOR, a hamlet in that part of the parish of Bethgelart which is in the hundred of ARDUDWY, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (N. E.) from Bethgelart, containing 294 inhabitants. It forms one of those glens among the mountains at the foot of Snowdon which extend into Merionethshire.

NANT Y BAI, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES.—See RHANDIR ABBOT.

NARBERTH, a newly created borough, market town, and parish, comprising the North and South divisions, each of which separately maintains its own poor, in the hundred of NARBERTH, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,  $14\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. E.) from Pembroke, and 254 (W.) from London, containing 2589 inhabitants, of which number, 1852 are in the North, and 737 in the South, division. This place, in ancient records called "Arberth," appears to have been distinguished at a very early period as the residence of some of the chieftains of the country; and mention occurs, in the earlier periods of its history, of Pwyll Pendevig, of the royal house of Dyved, setting out from his palace of Narberth to hunt in the vale of "Cych." On the conquest of Pembrokeshire by Arnulph de Montgomery, in the reign of William Rufus, this place became the head of a considerable lordship, which was allotted by Arnulph to Stephen Perrott, who had accompanied him in his expedition into this part of the principality, and who is said to have erected, for the security of his territories, a fortress on the summit of a hill (still called Camp hill) between the village of Templeton, in this parish, and the present town. This spot was well adapted to the purposes of observation and defence, and was at that time covered with a thick forest; and the remains of military works, which, according to the Welsh Chronicles, were destroyed by Gruffydd ab Rhys, may yet be traced. Sir Andrew Perrott, grandson of the first knight, subsequently erected the castle, of which the remains form so prominent and picturesque a feature in the foreground of the town. For this purpose he selected a very eligible site, commanding the pass of the valley through which the high road through the county passes; and having completed the building, he garrisoned it with a party of Flemings, whom Henry I. had settled in this part of the principality, and for whom and his dependents, under the immediate protection of the castle, Sir Andrew built habitations, which formed the origin of the present town. Little is recorded of the history of the castle, which in 1256 was taken, and the fortifications destroyed, by Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, Prince of North Wales; but it appears to have recovered from the injury it received upon that occasion. The lordship and castle were generally the property of the crown, or of some distinguished member of the English peerage, till the reign of Henry VIII., who gave them to Sir Rhys ab Thomas, at which time the castle was in a good state of repair, according to the testimony of Leland, who describes it as "a praty pile of old Sir Rees." The castle suffered material injury during the usurpation of Cromwell; but it appears, notwithstanding, to have remained in a habitable state till the year 1657, when it formed part of the immense possessions of the Barlows of Slebech, who, in the 4th of James II., obtained permission to hold here a market and fair, and to receive the tolls and customs arising from them.

The town is pleasantly situated on an eminence above a narrow valley, a little to the eastward of the Eastern Cleddy river, and in the northern division of the parish: it consists principally of three narrow streets

diverging obliquely from the market-place, which is in the centre. The houses are irregularly built and of mean appearance; and the town, which is neither paved nor lighted, and is indifferently supplied with water, fails in realizing the expectations which the distant view of it excites. As seen from the adjacent heights, with its church, and the picturesque remains of its ancient castle, mantled with ivy, it forms a prominent and highly interesting object; but on a nearer approach, its want of regularity in the order, and of beauty in the form, of its buildings, destroys the effect of its distant appearance. The surrounding scenery is richly varied and beautifully picturesque. The southern portion of the parish produces abundance of excellent limestone, of which great quantities are burnt for the supply of the surrounding neighbourhood, and a considerable portion is quarried for building, some of which, from its being susceptible of a fine polish, is manufactured into mantel-pieces of great beauty. The town has derived a considerable degree of importance, and a large increase in its population, from its public situation on the great western road from London to Milford. A lock-up house, having over it a room in which magisterial and parochial meetings are held, has recently been built by a grant from the county rates and by subscription; and a new market-house, considered to be one of the most commodious in South Wales, has just been completed, at the sole expense of the Baron de Rutzen, of Slebech Hall, the proprietor of the castle and lord of the manor, which he obtained by marriage with the heiress of the late Nathaniel Philipps, Esq. Hats are manufactured here to a limited extent. The market is on Thursday, and is abundantly supplied with provisions of every kind, at an extremely moderate price. Fairs are annually held by charter on March 21st, June 4th, July 5th, August 10th, September 26th, and December 11th; and to these have been added two others, recently established, of which one is held on the 13th of May, and the other, which is called the Jubilee Fair, on the 25th of October: this last was held for the first time in 1810, in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the accession of George III.: they are all noted cattle fairs, and are much resorted to by graziers and drovers from England. By the late act for amending the representation of the people, Narberth has been created a borough, contributory with Fishguard to that of Haverfordwest in the return of a member to parliament: the right of election is vested in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act directs: the present number of tenements of this value within the limits of the borough, which are minutely described in the Appendix to this work, is one hundred. It has also been made a polling-place in the election of a knight for the shire. The petty sessions for the hundred are held here.

The living is a rectory, with Robeston-Wathen annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £25. 10. 10., and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Andrew, and supposed to have been originally founded by Sir Andrew Perrott, the founder of the castle, has been recently rebuilt, partly by subscription, aided by a grant of £150 from the

Incorporated Society for promoting the building and enlargement of churches and chapels, and partly by a rate upon the inhabitants, amounting to one-third of the whole expense. It is a very neat edifice, in the later style of English architecture, and, in consideration of the grant from the society, contains one hundred and fifty free sittings, in addition to fifty which were previously unappropriated. Prior to the incumbency of the present rector, the Rev. W. Lloyd, both the church and parsonage-house were in a very dilapidated condition; but a new rectory-house and commodious out-buildings have been just completed, at an expense of £1050, raised by a mortgage on the living, under Gilbert's Act. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. George Devonald, Esq., of Sodston, has lately by deed charged the farm of Rushacre with the payment of £30 per annum for the support of a school in this parish, in which poor children are to be taught reading and writing; and it is in contemplation to erect a school-room, in order to carry into effect the intentions of the beneficent donor. The remains of the ancient castle, which appears to have been a structure of considerable extent, consist principally of the grand gateway between two circular towers partly clothed with ivy, and some small portions of the walls; though inconsiderable in their extent, they possess a very pleasing and interesting character, and from their situation have a highly picturesque appearance. On the eastern verge of Canaston wood, but within this parish, are the remains of a fine old British intrenchment, nearly triangular in form, and comprising an area of two acres and a half in extent, with the longest side towards the river Cleddy: it is defended on all sides, except on the east, where it is protected by a natural ravine, by a lofty rampart of great breadth, and has only one entrance at the south-eastern angle. About a mile to the south of the town is the ancient village of Templeton, so called from its having been anciently the resort of the Knights Templar of Slebech, who were accustomed to pursue the diversion of hunting at this place: the cottages in this village have an appearance of great antiquity, and the remains of numerous ruined buildings, together with the tradition that there was anciently a church or chapel of ease here, on the site of which is a building, subsequently used by a congregation of Unitarian dissenters, and now as a school-room, in connection with the established church, afford evidence of its having been at one time a place of greater importance. Grove, in this parish, the property of Charles Poyer Callen, Esq., is chiefly remarkable as having been the patrimonial inheritance of the celebrated Colonel Poyer, who so gallantly defended Pembroke castle during the parliamentary war, and who, together with Colonels Laugharne and Powell, was tried by Cromwell for high treason, and sentenced to suffer death. Cromwell, being prevailed upon to spare the lives of two, three papers were folded up, on two of which was written "Life given by God," and the third, which was blank, having fallen by lot to Colonel Poyer, he was shot in Covent Garden, on the 25th of April, 1649. From this circumstance the family motto, — "Sors est contra me," has been taken. From a field upon this estate is obtained a most extensive prospect over the counties of Cardigan, Carmarthen, Glamorgan, and Pembroke in Wales, and over those of Cornwall, Devon, and Somerset in England. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of the entire parish, from March 1824 to March 1829, amounted to £492. 1., of which sum, £359. 18. was raised on the North, and £132. 3. on the South, division; but since that period the aggregate expenditure may be estimated at £660 per annum, of which the proportions are £480 for the North, and £180 for the South, division.

NASH, an extra-parochial district, adjoining the parish of LLYSWORNEY, in the hundred of COWBRIDGE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (S. W. by W.) from Cowbridge, containing 9 inhabitants. This place, which is pleasantly situated in the south-eastern part of the county, and within a short distance of the Bristol channel, comprises about three hundred acres of rich arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The ancient seat of the family of Carne, and now the patrimonial residence of Mrs. Markham, a descendant of that family, is a spacious mansion, chiefly erected in the reign of Elizabeth: the grounds, which are tastefully disposed, comprehend some pleasingly diversified scenery, and the distant views are not destitute of interest. A chapel for the family was formerly regularly served; but divine service has not been performed in it within the memory of the oldest inhabitant.

NASH, a parish partly in the hundred of CASTLE-MARTIN, and partly in that of NARBERTH, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (N. E.) from Pembroke, containing 133 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated in the southern part of the county, and near a small inlet from Milford Haven, comprises but a moderate portion of land, which is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The surrounding scenery, though not distinguished by any striking peculiarity of feature, is generally pleasing; and the adjacent country affords some interesting objects, and some views which are not destitute of beauty. The great turnpike road leading from Narberth to Pembroke passes through the southern part of the parish. The living is a rectory, with Upton annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. 12. 8½., and in the patronage of the Rev. William Evans. The church is a very ancient structure, remarkable for the rude simplicity of its architecture, and is said to have been erected by one of the earliest Norman proprietors of Upton castle. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £20. 2.

NEATH (CASTELL NEDD), a borough, market town, and parish, in the hundred of NEATH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 35 miles (W. N. W.) from Cardiff, and 197 (W.) from London, on the road from Cardiff to Swansea, containing 4043 inhabitants. This place, which is by all antiquaries allowed to have been the "Nidum" of the Romans, derives its name from the river on which it is situated, and of which the Welsh name, "Nidd," or

"Nedd," is pronounced nearly as the English word Neath. In the twelfth Iter of Antoninus it is mentioned, under the above name, as being situated on the Roman road between Leucarum (Loughor) and Bovium, at or near the present village of Boverton, to the south of Cowbridge. Though repeated and minute researches have been made at various times, no military works have yet been discovered which mark out, with any degree of precision, the exact site of the station. The churchyard, which is of considerable extent and in the form of a parallelogram, with a small elevation at the western side, has with some degree of probability been considered the site of the original camp; and, within the last few years, two Roman coins and a cameo are said to have been found in the garden adjoining the rectory-house, which is within twenty yards of the spot. After the conquest of Glamorganshire by Fitz-Hamon, Richard de Granville, one of his knights, obtained a grant of the honour and lordship of Neath, with the privilege of exercising jura regalia, and all the other rights of a lordship marcher. The castle, of which only a small portion is at present remaining, is said to have formed part of the possessions of Iestyn ab Gwrgan, by whom it is supposed to have been originally built; but it is certain that Richard de Granville, if not the founder, materially improved it: the church, which is in its immediate vicinity, is supposed to have been originally a chapel for the accommodation of the garrison, and to have been subsequently enlarged and appropriated to the use of the parishioners. The same Richard, in the reign of Henry I., with the concurrence of his wife Constance, gave their chapel belonging to the castle, with all its endowments, a considerable tract of waste land in the neighbourhood, and other possessions, to the abbot of the convent of Grey friars at Savigny, near Lyons in France, for the erection and endowment of a similar monastery near the town of Neath. A magnificent abbey was consequently erected in the neighbourhood, from designs by a celebrated architect from Palestine, named Lalys, who also erected several churches and other public buildings in South Wales. The abbey, which was at first dedicated to the Holy Trinity, was subsequently occupied by brethren of the Cistercian order; but it does not appear to have been dependent upon any foreign religious establishment, or to have been regarded as an Alien priory, as it continued to flourish till the time of the general dissolution, when its revenue was £150. 4. 9. per annum. During the protracted warfare between the lords marcher and the native chieftains, however, one of the latter, named Morgan ab Owain, burned this monastery, killing four of the servants and one of the monks, and committed great ravages on its lands. The ruins of this venerable pile, which once afforded an asylum to the unfortunate Edward of Carnarvon, are among the most interesting specimens of ancient ecclesiastical architecture in the principality, and are noticed under the article on CADOXTON, in which parish they are situated. Soon after the accession of Stephen, Gruffydd ab Rhŷs, having laid waste the Norman possessions in Cardiganshire, advanced into the territory of Glamorgan; and the Norman lords, rallying their forces in the neighbourhood of this town, were here attacked by the Welsh army, led on by the sons of Caradoc ab

Iestyn, who were lords of the district between the rivers Tawe and Avon, and a sanguinary conflict ensued, in which three thousand men are said to have fallen by the sword: the Normans were completely routed, and the few that survived the battle were compelled to seek an asylum in the castles of Gower. About a century after this event, the town, which had been burnt to the ground in 1185, was again taken, and the inhabitants were nearly exterminated by Morgan Gam and Llewelyn, in 1231.

The town is pleasantly situated on the eastern bank of the navigable river Neath, over which is a bridge, and in the beautiful Vale of Neath, which abounds with rich and finely varied scenery. The vale, which expands to a considerable breadth at this place, and is open on both sides to the adjacent country, is remarkable for the salubrity of its air, and is finely sheltered from the colder winds by the lofty hills with which it is surrounded, without being at all confined. The town has recently undergone extensive improvement; preparations have been made for lighting it with gas, and several of the streets have been considerably widened and well paved: the houses, which have been modernized, are in general respectable, and there are some of handsome appearance. A reading-room, supported by public subscription, has been established; and occasional concerts and balls take place at the Castle hotel, which affords excellent accommodation to the numerous visitors who are attracted to this place by the interesting scenery in the neighbourhood, and the beautiful cascades with which the Vale of Neath abounds, of which an account will be found in the articles on the parishes of Cadoxton, Ystradvelltey, Penderin, &c. From its situation in a populous district surrounded by extensive copper, iron, tin, and chemical works, this town has been for some years increasing in importance as a place of commerce: the almost inexhaustible mines of coal being more than sufficient for the supply of the town and neighbourhood, and of the various works in the environs, great quantities are annually shipped off to the lower parts of Somersetshire, Devonshire, and Cornwall, and to Ireland. It is computed that one hundred thousand tons are brought down the vale by the Neath canal alone, for exportation. At Neath abbey, about one mile from the town, are some iron-works, established in 1792, and conducted on a very extensive scale: they consist of two blast furnaces for the making of iron from the ore, an iron foundry for casting the various parts of engine and mill work, and an engine-manufactory. From this establishment most of the iron-works in the principality have been furnished with their powerful engines for blowing the furnaces used in the manufacture of iron, and for the rolling of that metal; and the copper-works also have been supplied with rolling engines and with the requisite machinery for the manufacture of copper. Many of the large pumping engines now in operation in the mining districts of Cornwall were made in this establishment, which has also supplied the Anglo-Mexican and Real del Monte mining companies with steam-engines for draining their mines: engines for maritime uses, and locomotive engines on rail and tram roads, have likewise been made to a very considerable extent. The number of persons employed in these works and in the collieries and mines connected with them averages about four hundred. The copper-works are situated to the south of Neath Abbey, on the western bank of the river, and form two establishments, called the Crown and the Mines Royal works, belonging respectively to the Crown and the Mines Royal copper companies. The tin-works are on the banks of the river and of the canal, about one mile and a half above the town; and on the eastern side of the river, a little below the town, are some extensive chemical works. This port is a creek to that of Swansea: the exports are coal, culm, copper, iron, iron castings, spelter, fire-bricks, oak timber, bark, and wool; the imports are copper and iron ores, corn, flour, foreign timber, black jack, and groceries and other articles of general consumption. The trade is of considerable extent, although it sustained, in comparison with the two preceding years, a diminution in 1830. The amount of tonnage for the year 1828 was one hundred and eight thousand three hundred and ninety; that for 1829 was one hundred and twenty-one thousand two hundred and sixty-five; and that for 1830 was ninety-eight thousand three hundred and seventeen. The number of vessels which cleared outwards, during the year 1830, including different departures of the same, was one thousand one hundred and forty-six; and the number that entered inwards, reckoning as above, and exclusively of such as came in with ballast only, was four hundred and thirty-four: this year (1832) the trade has considerably increased. The port is at Briton-Ferry, about two miles and a quarter below the bridge at Neath, by the course of the river: vessels of upwards of three hundred tons' burden can sail up to the town, but the trade of the port is generally carried on by means of barges communicating with Briton-Ferry. The construction of a floating harbour within the borough, on the left bank of the river, was once in contemplation, but the design has been abandoned. The harbour has been greatly improved at an expense of £3000, which was defrayed conjointly by the Neath Canal Company and the proprietors of the works in the neighbourhood; and the alterations that have been made have been productive of considerable benefit. The Neath canal extends from Briton-Ferry to Abernant, near the head of the vale, a distance of thirteen miles: at Aberdulas, about one mile and a half above the town, it is united by a stone aqueduct of eleven arches with the Swansea and Neath junction canal, by means of which the mineral riches on either side of the vale may be conveyed to the port of Swansea: the latter canal is remarkable for being carried through a distance of nine miles without a lock. The market, which is well supplied with corn and with provisions of every kind, is on Wednesday; and the fairs are on the Thursday after Trinity Sunday, July 31st, and September 12th.

Neath, having become united to the great lordship of Glamorgan, was one of the places which obtained from Edward II. a new charter, conferring upon it valuable immunities, and granted through the influence of that monarch's favourite, the younger Hugh Spencer, among whose possessions this lordship was included. It is nevertheless regarded as a borough by prescription, though it has a charter granted in the reign of James II., which is addressed to the "Recorder, Aldermen, and Burgesses:" the government is at present vested in a portreeve, twelve aldermen, and an indefinite number of burgesses. The portreeve is annually chosen by the aldermen, who nominate three of their body for that purpose, of whom the lord of the borough, or his officer, the constable of the castle, selects one: the aldermen fill up vacancies in their own body from the burgesses, who are elected by the corporation at large; but in both cases the appointment is subject to the approval of the lord. Neath is one of eight contributory boroughs which returned one member to parliament: of these, the boroughs of Swansea, Aberavon, Kenvig, Loughor, and Neath, have, by the late act for amending the representation of the people, been constituted a separate district, with the privilege of returning a representative. The right of election was formerly in the burgesses at large, about one hundred in number, of whom about twenty reside within the borough: it is now, by the late act, vested in the resident burgesses only, or those within seven miles of the town, if duly qualified according to its provisions, and in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of ten pounds and upwards, provided he be capable of registering as the act directs: the present number of tenements of this value, within the limits of the borough, which have been altered by the late Boundary Act, and are minutely described in the Appendix to this work, is about one hundred and eighty-five. The corporation claim, but do not exercise, the right of holding a court of pleas for the recovery of debts to any amount, before the constable of the castle and the portreeve: a court baron is held by the constable of the castle, for the recovery of debts under forty shillings. The Midsummer quarter sessions for the county, and the petty sessions for the hundred, are held at Neath, which has also been made a polling-place in the election of knights for the shire. The town-hall is a neat and commodious edifice, in the Grecian style of architecture, with a handsome receding portico of the Ionic order; but, being out of the line of the principal thoroughfare, it is not seen to advantage. The upper part of the building contains a spacious council-chamber, with a jury-room and apartments for the petty sessions and other business of the local magistracy; and the lower part is appropriated to the use of the corn market.

The living is a rectory, with Lantwit annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £16. 2. 3½., and in the patronage of Henry Grant, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Thomas the Apostle, is a spacious and ancient structure, of which the nave was rebuilt about a century since: the interior is handsomely and commodiously fitted up, and a fine-toned organ was presented by the late Sir R. H. Mackworth, Bart. There are two places of worship each for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists, and one each for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Calvinistic Methodists, and Unitarians. Mr. John Davies, in 1719, bequeathed £200 to be laid out in the purchase of land for the erection and endowment of a free school: with this sum two tenements, called Brÿndare and Ynyscoed, containing together about eighty-four acres, have been purchased; but the original intention of the testator has not yet been fully carried into effect. The interest of £500, which had been received in lieu of the accumulated rent of these farms, together with the interest of £100 left by the late Mr. Gwyn, has, in the interim, been appropriated in aid of a school upon Dr. Bell's plan, which is principally supported by subscription. The rental of the two farms, together with £100 left by William Cross, in 1785, and £30, its accumulated interest, is under the management of the rector, churchwardens, and overseers. In connexion with the iron-works at Neath Abbey are two schools on the Lancasterian plan, in one of which eighty boys, and in the other fifty girls, are gratuitously instructed. On an enquiry instituted a few years since, when the proprietors of the abbey estate were solicited to make a grant of timber for the erection of new school-houses, it was found that, for the thirty-five years during which these schools had been established, only one of the poor children educated in them had become chargeable on the parish. There is also an infant school supported by subscription, in which forty-five children are taught. There are various charitable bequests for distribution among the poor, among which are £2 per annum left by Evan Leyson, in 1634; £1 per annum by William Cross, in 1785; the interest of £5 by Mary Jones, and £3. 16. per ann. paid out of the parish rates, as interest due upon a legacy bequeathed by J. Davies, which is supposed to have been appropriated to parochial uses. Within this parish is Gnoll Castle, formerly the seat of Sir Herbert Mackworth, Bart., whose widow conveyed it by marriage to Capel Hanbury Leigh, Esq., of Pontypool Park, in the county of Monmouth, from whom it was purchased by Henry Grant, Esq., to whom, as proprietor of the estate, belongs also the custody of the castle and the lordship of the borough. The mansion, which possesses all the magnificence of a baronial residence, is a conspicuous object from all parts of the circumjacent country, and has been recently modernized: the principal front consists of a centre, with wings and two semicircular towers; and the grounds, which are extensive, are laid out with great taste. Of the ancient castle of Neath only some small portions in the lower part of the town, near the river, are at present remaining; and of the walls which anciently encompassed the town there are no vestiges. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor of the town and parish, from March 1824 to March 1829, amounted to £726. 4., but may now be estimated at upwards of £1000.

NEATH-GENOL, or MIDDLE (NEDD-GENOL, or GANOL), a hamlet separately maintaining its own poor, in the parish of CADOXTON, hundred of NEATH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 10 miles (N. E.) from Neath, containing 271 inhabitants. This hamlet is finely situated in the richly fertile and highly picturesque Vale of Neath: the surrounding scenery is beautifully diversified, and from the higher grounds are some pleasing and interesting views. The Neath canal terminates within its limits, and a short railroad proceeds thence to the coal-pits in the neighbourhood: the roads from Brecknock and Merthyr-Tydvil to Neath unite here, the line then proceeding along the vale between the canal and the right bank of the river. Aberpergwm, the ancient seat of the family of Williams, and now the residence of William Williams, Esq., is a fine old mansion, pleasantly situated in grounds tastefully disposed, and comprehending much interesting and pleasing scenery. Oliver Cromwell, who was in some degree related to the ancestor of the present proprietor, is said to have halted at this place on his way to Milford Haven (where he was going to embark for Ireland), and to have despatched messengers to acquaint the family with his arrival, and to demand their good offices in forwarding his expedition, informing them at the same time of the degree of affinity which subsisted between them. Receiving no encouragement from the family, who were zealously attached to the royal cause, he fired a few shots over the mansion by way of intimidation, and departed without offering any further violence. This account, which has hitherto been supported by tradition only, derives corroborative testimony from the discovery of some cannon balls, in turning up the ground near the house, in the year 1831. In the grounds of this mansion stands a chapel of ease to the parish church. On a hill above the house are traces of the Via Julia Montana, or Roman road leading from Brecknock to Nidum (Neath). Near the side of this road was a stone with a Roman inscription, which Mr. Llwyd, in his communications for Bishop Gibson's edition of Camden, reads Marci Caritini filii Berici: it has been removed, and is now placed in a grotto within the grounds of Gnoll Castle. On the same eminence, and near the site of the above stone, are two barrows surrounded by circular intrenchments. In this hamlet is also the seat of John Edwards Vaughan, Esq., a splendid mansion, situated in a beautifully picturesque portion of the vale, of which it commands an interesting view, and surrounded with thriving and luxuriant plantations. Among the various features of natural beauty by which the scenery of the vale is distinguished are the frequent cascades formed by the collected waters after excessive rains upon the mountains, which are precipitated thence into the valley. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £147. 1.

NEATH (NEDD) LOWER, a hamlet in the parish of CADOXTON, hundred of NEATH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (N. E.) from Neath, containing 185 inhabitants. This place is beautifully situated in the Vale of Neath, which abounds with strikingly picturesque and richly varied scenery: from the hills in this part of the vale descend numerous mountain streams, forming small but beautiful cascades, which enliven the scene, and add beauty and variety to the landscape. The whole of this district is exceedingly rich in mineral treasure: iron-stone and coal are found in great abundance and of excellent quality; and at Ynys y Gerwyn, in this hamlet, some works have been established, on a moderate scale, for extracting the metal from the copper slag, which afford employment to a portion of the inhabitants. The Neath canal, which commences near Briton-Ferry, and extends for thirteen miles to Abernant, crosses the vale and river of Neath near this place. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £110. 15.

NEATH (NEDD) UPPER, a hamlet in the parish of CADOXTON, hundred of NEATH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 12 miles (N. E.) from Neath, containing 617 inhabitants. This place is pleasantly situated in one of the finest portions of the Vale of Neath, and in the midst of an extensive district abounding with mineral wealth: the surrounding scenery, like that which prevails throughout this part of the country, abounds with variety and beauty. Within the limits of the hamlet is the small but pleasant village of Glyn Neath, a convenient resting-place between Neath and Merthyr-Tydvil, where an excellent inn and posting-house has been established for the accommodation of persons travelling on that line of road. About two miles higher up the vale is the little village of Pont Neath Vaughan, so called from a bridge at this place over the Lesser Neath, which river here separates the counties of Brecknock and Glamorgan. The vicinity abounds with iron-stone and coal, which are worked upon a very extensive scale, affording employment to many of the inhabitants. In the veins of coal are frequently discovered beautiful specimens of the British diamond, which are found at a great depth in the mines. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £100. 17.

NERQUIS (NERCWYS), a chapelry in the parish and hundred of MOLD, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S.) from Mold, containing 470 inhabitants. It is situated in a well-cultivated country, the population being almost exclusively agricultural. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Mold. The chapel, dedicated to St. Mary, is a neat edifice with a handsome steeple, and contains a richly decorated niche in the interior, in which was anciently a figure of the Virgin. Here is an old mansion, erected in 1638, by a branch of the Wynne family. Some plantations have been made here, within the last twenty years, by W. M. Thackeray, Esq., M. D., which are now in a flourishing condition. Divers benefactions, amounting in the whole to £15 per annum, have been made for the instruction of poor children. This hamlet is separately assessed for the support of its poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £240. 14.

NEVERN, a parish in the hundred of KEMMES, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (E. N. E.) from Newport, and 8 (S. W. by W.) from Cardigan, which is the post town, containing 1558 inhabitants. This place derives its name from the river Nevern, so called from the Welsh Niver, "a number," on account of its being formed by the union of numerous rivulets which intersect the parish, and flow together in one considerable stream into St. George's channel. Martin de Tours, a Norman knight, who, having attended William the Conqueror, was rewarded for his services by a grant of territory on the coast of Devonshire, embarked an expedition for the invasion of such parts of the principality as he might find most easily assailable, landed his troops at Fishguard, and made himself master of the lordship of Kemmes. For the protection of his newly acquired territory, which became one of the lordships marcher, he either erected a fortress at this place, or strengthened one previously built, which he made his residence, and which descended to his son William, who, having strengthened his interest by marrying the daughter of Rhys ab Gruffydd, abandoned this seat of his father, called Llanhyvor castle, of which there are some remains on a hill above the church, for one which he had built on a more magnificent scale at Newport. This parish, which is very large, extending from the sea to the foot of the Precelly mountains, is situated on the shore of Cardigan bay, in a beautifully diversified and fertile district, and comprehends some of the most picturesque and romantic scenery in the county of Pembroke, being intersected by a deep wooded dingle, through which flows the Nevern, the banks of which are occasionally formed into rocks of fantastic character, while in the lower part, near Newport bay, stands the village: the prospects from the higher grounds are also pleasing and extensive. The high road from Newport to Cardigan passes near it, and by far the greater portion of the parish is enclosed and cultivated. The coast is generally bold and in some parts precipitous, with a good depth of water close to the shore. Here were formerly several ancient mansions, inhabited by some of the most opulent families in the county; but, with very few exceptions, they have been abandoned by their proprietors, and are at present in the occupation of tenants. Llwyngwair, the seat of George Bowen, Esq., is an elegant mansion, pleasantly situated on the margin of the river Nevern, and nearly within a mile of its mouth. Near it is Burry, the residence of the female branches of the same family. Cwmgloyn is the property of Maurice Williams, Esq.; and Hênllŷs, once the residence of the ancient lords of Kemmes, and still the property of their representative, Thomas Lloyd, Esq., of Bronwydd, is now occupied by a tenant: it was the residence of that distinguished antiquary and scholar George Owen, lord of Kemmes, in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £8, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The advowson, which was once appendant to the lordship of Kemmes, was alienated by deed, bearing date 1347, to Bishop Hoton, who appropriated it to his new college of St. Mary at St. David's, from which, on the suppression of religious houses, it reverted to the crown. The church is said to have been originally founded in the sixth century, by St. Brynach, or Byrnach, to whom it is dedicated, and rebuilt by some of the Norman lords of Kemmes: the present is an ancient and venerable structure, in the Norman style of architecture. In the churchyard, to the south of the porch, there is the shaft of an ancient British cross, elaborately wrought, and bearing an inscription near the centre, which is almost obliterated: it consists of a single stone, thirteen feet high, two feet broad, and eight feet thick, with a circular top charged with a cross, and carved on all sides with other crosses, and knots of various shapes. On the north side of the churchyard was another stone, six feet high, with the inscription "VITATIANI EMERITI," but this has been for some time removed. In the hamlet of Kilgwin, in this parish, there is a chapel of ease, dedicated to St. Mary. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic Methodists. Mr. Rogers bequeathed £800 in the three per cents, to the poor, the dividends arising from which are annually distributed in barley and beef on the 21st of December. Near Pentre Evan, in this parish, are the remains of one of the largest cromlechs in the principality: the table stone is eighteen feet in length and nine feet wide, and is supported on three coarse upright stones, from seven to eight feet high: it is considered not to be surpassed in size and height by any other Druidical monument in Wales or England, except Stonehenge and Abury. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £573. 6.

NEVIN, or NEVYN, a borough, market town, and parish, in the hundred of DINLLAEN, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 20 miles (S. W. by S.) from Carnarvon, and 270 (W. N. W.) from London, by Carnarvon, containing 1726 inhabitants. The origin of this place is not accurately known; but from some remains of strong intrenchments, evidently of Roman construction, near the harbour called "Porth yn llyn," or "Porth Dinllaen," about a mile from the present town, on a narrow headland jutting out into the sea, and which protects it from the violence of westerly winds, it is supposed to have been a port frequented by the Romans. Of its early history little is recorded previously to the final subjugation of Wales by Edward I., at which time it appears to have been a place of some importance, and to have been selected by that monarch, in the year 1284, for the celebration of a triumphant festival in honour of his entire conquest of the principality. Probably with a view to conciliate the affections of the Welsh, or to amuse or flatter their military spirit, Edward, upon this occasion, resolved to hold a round table, in compliment to their renowned hero Arthur, the supposed founder of that custom, and a grand tournament, which was attended not only by all the English nobility, but also by some of the most distinguished knights from foreign countries, who took part in the proceedings, in which Edward himself acquired great distinction. The concourse of persons assembled upon this occasion is by all writers represented as very great; and traces of the circular earthwork within which the military feats took place may still be seen on the road to Edern. In the reign of Edward III., Edward the Black Prince, in the twelfth year of his investiture with the principality of Wales, granted this place to Nigel de Lohareyn, in reward for his faithful services and gallant conduct on the field of Poitiers; and by charter, dated at Carnarvon, made the town a free borough, granted to the burgesses a guild mercatry, and two annual fairs and a market, and endowed it with all the privileges enjoyed by royal boroughs, together with the liberties and customs heretofore granted to Newborough, in the county of Anglesey. Early in the present century, a scheme was projected for the improvement of this place and neighbourhood, by bringing a new line of road across the Traeth Mawr from Merionethshire to Porth-Dinllaen, close to the town, by building a pier and constructing a harbour here, and by making this port a station for the packets to Ireland, in lieu of Holyhead. For this purpose an act of parliament was obtained in 1806, under the provisions of which a company was incorporated for carrying the plan into effect; but on a second application to parliament for further aid, after some progress had been made in the work, the undertaking was abandoned.

The town is situated on the shore of St. George's channel, at the base of the Eivl mountains, and near the bay of Nevin, which is separated only by a small headland from the broad, sandy, and secure bay of

Porth-Dinllaen: the houses are irregularly built and of mean appearance, the streets are neither paved nor lighted, and the inhabitants are but indifferently supplied with water. The surrounding scenery is boldly varied, but is chiefly of mountainous character: the coast in the neighbourhood of the town is abrupt and rocky, being occasionally broken by several small creeks affording secure anchorage for boats and small craft during the fishing season. Among these may be noticed Porth Towyn, Porth Colman, Porth Gwylan, and Porth Ysgadan. Though good roads from Carnarvon and Tremadoc have been made to the town, affording a facility of intercourse with those places, there is neither any manufacture carried on, nor any trade except what arises from the situation of the town upon the seashore, and which consists only in shipping eggs, poultry, and pigs, in exchange for coal, to Liverpool, with which place a regular communication is kept up. The market is held weekly on Saturday, but is very ill attended; and fairs are held annually on April 11th, August 18th, and October 20th. The government of the borough, by charter of Edward the Black Prince, is vested in a mayor, two bailiffs, and a recorder: the mayor, who holds his office for life, and the bailiffs, who are chosen annually, are elected by the freemen at large; and the recorder is appointed by the mayor. Nevin is one of the ancient contributory boroughs within the county, which, with Bangor, recently added, return one member to parliament: the right of voting was formerly in the burgesses at large, in number about forty-five, but is now, by the late act for amending the representation of the people, vested in the resident burgesses only, if duly qualified according to its provisions, and in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of ten pounds and upwards, provided he be capable of registering as the act directs: the present number of tenements of this value, within the limits of the borough, which comprise about nine hundred acres within the parish, and have not been altered by the late Boundary Act, is seventeen. The freedom is obtained only by gift of the corporation at large. The borough has no separate jurisdiction, nor is any court held except for the election of the bailiffs, which takes place on the 29th of September.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of C. G. Wynne, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, is a neat plain edifice, and was rebuilt in 1825, at the expense of the landholders of the parish. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A sequestered vale in the vicinity of the town is supposed to have been the retreat of Vortigern, after his expulsion from the throne of England, who is said to have occupied a castle here, which, according to monkish writers, was destroyed by lightning, himself having been killed on the occasion. Tradition still points out a small verdant mound as the site of this residence; and near it is a tumulus, now covered with turf, called Bedd Gwrtheyrn, or "Vortigern's grave," in which, on being opened some years since, was found a stone coffin containing the bones of a tall man, supposed to have been the remains of that unfortunate king. This vale, which from that circumstance is called Nant Gwrtheyrn, is embosomed in lofty mountains, by the rugged declivities of which it is enclosed on every side, except towards the sea; and across the bwlch or hollow by which it is approached from the interior of the mountains extends a large rampart of loose stones. Near Cevn Anwllch, an ancient seat to the south of the town, are the remains of a large cromlech, called by the common people Coeten Arthur. Between the coast at this place and the English border there appears to have been a chain of military posts, originating near the town, and passing near Trêmadoc into the county of Merioneth, continued thence by Bala, entering the county of Denbigh above Pistyll Rhaiadr, and proceeding to Old Port near Oswestry. Brÿnodol, a good mansion, four miles from the town, pleasantly situated on a gentle eminence, as seen from the sea, commands an extensive view of a large tract of level country, bounded on one side by a chain of mountains, in the foreground of which Bodvean and Carn Madryn are conspicuous, and beyond them the whole range of the lofty mountains of Snowdon. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £269. 4.

NEWBOROUGH, a parish, formerly a borough, in the hundred of MENAI, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (N.W. by W.) from Carnarvon, containing 804 inhabitants. This place, which derives its present name from its having been constituted a free borough by Edward I., was anciently called Rhôs Vair, from a small church, dedicated to St. Mary, which stood at the head of the manor; or, according to Mr. Rowlands, more properly Rhôs Hîr, from its situation in an extensive marshy plain on the eastern side of the Malldraeth sands, and near a long dorsal ridge covered with heath, which extends from this parish to Mynydd Llwydiarth. Though at present a very inconsiderable place, it was originally of great importance, and was for many years the residence of the princes of North Wales, who had a palace here, where, or at Aberfraw, on the opposite side of the Malldraeth sands, they occasionally fixed their seat of government, as the exigencies of that turbulent period might require. At the time of the final conquest of Wales by Edward I., this place appears to have been the chief town in the island, as well as the seat of justice for the whole comot of Menai, and was annexed to the royalties of the Prince of Wales by that monarch, who incorporated the burgesses and granted them a guild mercatory and other privileges, which were afterwards confirmed by a charter of the 17th of Edward II., and by a parliament held in the 1st of Edward III. In the reign of Henry VII., upon a misrepresentation made to that sovereign, the assizes and other county business were removed from Beaumaris, where they had previously been held for more than two hundred and fifty years, to Newborough, which thus became the county town. In the 15th of the reign of Henry VIII., the burgesses obtained a new charter, in which all the privileges conferred by former charters were recited and confirmed, but which was surrendered in the following year; and in the 27th of this reign, Newborough, as the county town, in conjunction with its contributory boroughs, returned one member to parliament, and continued to exercise that privilege till the 2nd of Edward VI., when, having greatly declined from its former importance, it was exempted on its own petition from contributing to the expense of supporting a member, and the elective franchise was confined exclusively to Beaumaris. In the 2nd and 3rd of this reign, the assizes, sessions, and general county business, were removed from this town, which had been found inconvenient for the purpose, and restored to Beaumaris, after having been held at Newborough for forty-five years. Notwithstanding these enactments, the burgesses of Newborough still claimed the privilege of sharing in the election of a member for Beaumaris; but the claim was strenuously resisted by the burgesses of the latter place, and the case was brought to issue in the House of Commons, in 1709, when the right of election was declared to be in the mayor, bailiffs, and capital burgesses of Beaumaris alone: similar efforts to recover the franchise were made in 1722 and 1724, but with the same result.

The town, which has now dwindled into an insignificant and obscure village, is situated near the southern extremity of the island, bordering on the extensive sea marshes of Malldraeth, and near the mouth of the small river Braint, which falls into the Menai strait near Abermenai ferry. The inhabitants are partly employed in the manufacture of matting, nets, ropes, and cordage, which are here made of the rushes that grow in profusion upon the marsh: a few are likewise engaged in fishing. The market, which was formerly held weekly, has been discontinued for many years: fairs are held annually on May 11th, June 29th, August 16th, September 25th, and November 11th. By virtue of its ancient charter, a mayor, recorder, and bailiffs are still annually elected by the inhabitants; but they exercise no jurisdiction, hold no courts, nor transact any public business. The parish includes the small remains of that of Llanddwyn, formerly a very extensive parish, situated to the west of Newborough, on the shore of St. George's channel, of which the whole has been destroyed by the encroachment of the sea, or buried under the sands which, during the prevalence of strong westerly gales, are drifted over considerable portions of the parish of Newborough, into which it has merged. Of the ancient church of Llanddwyn only the eastern gable, with some portion of the east window, can be seen: it was situated on a flat near the sea-shore, and was a fine structure, originally founded by St. Dwynwen, the tutelary saint of lovers, to whom it was dedicated, about the year 465. The fund arising from the offerings to the shrine of St. Dwynwen, by her numerous votaries, was very great; and in process of time the church became an abbey for monks of the Benedictine order, who derived a large revenue from the resort of strangers who came to enquire into their future destiny, which was predicted by the leaping of fish and the appearance of the water of a well, still called Fynnon Vair, or "St. Mary's well." In the time of Henry IV., its revenue was greater than that of any other religious house in North Wales, and in the survey of Henry VIII. it was the richest prebend in all the principality: at present not a vestige exists of this noble abbey, and even the place where it stood is scarcely with certainty known. The last rector of the parish of Llanddwyn was Richard Kyffyn, afterwards Dean of Bangor, who, according to Mr. Pennant, concerted, in conjunction with Sir Rhÿs ab Thomas and other

Welsh chieftains, a plan for placing the Earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII., on the throne, and with whom, at that time in Brittany, they carried on a correspondence by means of fishing vessels from this place. Numbers of vessels were formerly lost on the rocks on this part of the coast; but this evil has been materially removed by the erection of two beacons on the most prominent rocks, and the construction of a break-water at no great distance, which have been found highly beneficial to vessels navigating St. George's channel: these important improvements have been made by the trustees of the harbour of Carnarvon. Near Llanddwyn was the ferry of Abermenai, now deserted. The living of Newborough is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £9.10., and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, is a small edifice, possessing no claims to architectural description; it stands on an eminence in a bleak and exposed situation. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. In this parish is an upright stone with a mutilated Latin inscription, supposed to have been erected in commemoration of some ancient warrior. John Morgan, a blind musician, and the most celebrated of the latest performers on the ancient instrument called the crwth, was a native of this place. Newborough gives the title of baron in the peerage of Ireland to the family of Wynn. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £182.19.

NEWBRIDGE, an extensive and populous village in the parishes of LLANWONNO, EGLWYSILAN, and LANTWIT-VAIRDRE, partly in the hundred of CAERPHILLY, but principally in the hundred of MISKIN, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, on the turnpike road from Cardiff to Merthyr-Tydvil, 12 miles (S. by E.) from Merthyr-Tydvil. The population is returned with the respective parishes. It is situated on both banks of the river Tâf, which here receives the Rhondda, and derives its name from the celebrated bridge called Pont y Prydd, over the Tâf: there are also three other bridges connecting the different parishes. Its sudden rise and progressive increase and importance are entirely owing to the mineral treasures of the neighbourhood, and to its favourable situation on the line of the Glamorgan-shire canal, midway between Merthyr-Tydvil and the sea at Cardiff. It has for some time been distinguished for a chain cable manufactory, belonging to the firm of Messrs. Brown, Lenox, and Co., of London, where, among many other large works, the suspension bridges across the Thames at Hammersmith, and across the Usk and the Tweed, together with the Brighton chain pier, were made: the works usually afford employment to about one hundred persons. In that part of the village which is within the parish of Lantwit-Vairdre works have recently been completed, by Messrs. Biddulph and Co., for the manufacture of patent wrought iron railway plates; and, a little lower down the river, Mr. Crawshay of Merthyr is now erecting numerous cottages for the workmen, prior to the establishment of tin-mills. The entire length of the village is not less than a mile; and it is in contemplation to have a market at the southern extremity, as well as the northern, for the convenience of the work-

men. Pont y Prydd, otherwise called the New bridge, over the river Tâf, forms a beautiful and picturesque object from the various points at which it is visible; but, owing to the steepness of its ascent, it is somewhat inconvenient to travellers on horseback, and is almost impassable for vehicles heavily laden, which ford the stream, when practicable. It consists of one arch, one hundred and forty feet in the chord, and thirty-five feet in height above the level of the river at low water, forming the section of a circle of one hundred and seventy-five feet in diameter, which, at the time of its erection, was considered the largest stone arch in the world. At each extremity are three cylindrical holes, gradually diminishing in size as they approach the summit, introduced to relieve the arch from the extreme pressure arising from its abutments; the diameter of the lowest is nine feet, that of the middle six, and that of the uppermost four. The architect was Mr. William Edwards, a native of the parish of Eglwysilan, and a self-taught genius, whose talents procured for him great distinction as a bridge-builder: he first began the work, in 1746, by constructing a light and elegant bridge of three arches, which, in the course of about two years and a half after the period of its completion, was swept away by a flood of extraordinary magnitude, the mountain torrents having torn up by the roots several large trees, which, forming a dam as they floated along by the middle piers of the new bridge, caused a vast accumulation of the waters; and these, ultimately bursting through their barrier with irresistible force, carried away the entire structure. Bound by the terms of the contract to maintain the stability of the bridge for seven years, Edwards conceived the design of surmounting the difficulty by a structure of one arch, of the then unexampled width of one hundred and forty feet, from pier to pier, which he completed in 1751, having only to add the parapets; but, owing to the keystone of the arch being unable to resist the pressure of the abutments, the whole gave way and fell into the river. The luckless architect was thus driven a second time to the resources of his own fertile genius, to prevent the recurrence of so unpropitious an event: adhering to his latter plan of a single arch, he contrived an ingenious method for diminishing the enormous weight which had previously forced the key stone out of its place, by constructing the cylindrical holes in the present bridge, already described, which enabled him to complete this curious and much admired edifice. There are several places of worship for Dissenters, noticed in the parishes in which they are respectively situated. A branch of Mrs. Aldworth's school for female children, natives of the parish of Eglwysilan, has been established at Newbridge. Here was a curious rocking-stone, which, however, has been much injured of late; it stands near the turnpike road.

NEWCASTLE, a parish comprising the Higher and Lower hamlets, each of which separately maintains its own poor, in the hundred of NEWCASTLE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, adjoining the market town of Bridgend, and containing 890 inhabitants, of which number, 305 are in the Higher, and 585 in the Lower, hamlet. This parish, which is situated on the western bank of the river Ogmere, near its confluence with the river Ewenny, derives its name from a fortress of later date than that of Oldcastle, on the opposite bank of the Ogmore. By whom these castles were originally built has not been clearly ascertained; but their origin has been attributed to some of the Norman invaders of this part of the principality, who probably erected them for the protection of the territories of which they had obtained possession. The Lower hamlet forms part of the market town of Bridgend: the lands in the Higher hamlet are, with the exception of only a small portion, enclosed and cultivated. The scenery is generally pleasing, and from the eminence on which the church is situated is a fine view, including the influx of the Ogmore into the Bristol channel, the castles of Coyty and Ogmore, and the mansion of Coytrehene, higher up the river Ogmore, with its luxuriant groves, forming an assemblage of picturesque objects. The living is a discharged vicarage, with Bettws, Laleston, and Tythegston annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £7.7.3½, endowed with the rectorial tithes of the parish of Bettws, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Illtyd, is an ancient structure with a tower, and is situated on the declivity of an eminence. The interest of £20, bequeathed by several individuals, and of which £10 is vested in trust with the overseers, is annually distributed among the poor of the parish. The only remains of the ancient castle are, a gateway remarkable for the elegance of its pointed arch, and the ruins of the wall which enclosed the site; the area has been converted into a garden: they are the property of the Earl of Dunraven. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of the whole parish amounts to £288. 4., of which sum, £55. 16. is raised on the Higher, and £232. 8. on the Lower, hamlet.

NEWCASTLE, a joint township with Evenjobb, in the parish of OLD RADNOR, liberties of the borough of NEW RADNOR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 3¼ miles (E. N. E.) from New Radnor. The population is returned with Bareland.

NEWCASTLE-EMLYN, a market-town and chapelry, in the parish of KENARTH, higher division of the hundred of ELVET, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 19 miles (N. W. by N.) from Carmarthen, and 222 (W. by N.) from London. The population is included in the return for the parish. The ancient name of this place, Dinas Emlin, or "the city of Emlin," is thought by Mr. Llwyd to have been derived from Emilianus, a Roman settler in this part of the principality, who probably made it his residence; but no traces of Roman occupation have been discovered in corroboration of that opinion, nor have any vestiges of Roman antiquity been found in the immediate vicinity. Its modern name appears to have originated in the erection of a new castle, in the reign of Henry VII., by Sir Rhys ab Thomas, on the site of an ancient fortress probably built by the Normans, though neither the name of the founder, nor the precise time of the erection, of the original structure, is known. The ancient castle was besieged and taken, in 1215, by Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, who resigned it in the following year, when he divided the principality of South Wales between its rival princes, on which occasion this castle fell to the portion of Maelgwyn. In 1258, Llewelyn appointed a meeting of commissioners at this place, to deliberate upon the terms of a treaty of peace with the English;

but the negotiations were frustrated by the treachery of Patrick de Canton, the lieutenant of Henry III., who, perceiving that the party by which he was attended was stronger than that of Llewelyn, attacked the Welsh by surprise, and put many of them to the sword: the rest, who with difficulty effected their retreat, raised the country in the rear of the enemy, and the English forces were soon overtaken, and Patrick, with a large number of his adherents, was slain. In the reign of Edward I. the castle was besieged by Rhys ab Meredydd; but a large reinforcement being brought by Robert de Tibetot to the relief of the garrison, Rhys thought it prudent to raise the siege, and to retire in haste into Ireland. The castle, which had been rebuilt in the reign of Henry VII., by Sir Rhys ab Thomas, descended to his grandson, Rhys ab Gruffydd, on whose attainder, in the reign of Henry VIII., it became forfeited to the crown, and was granted to the Vaughans of Golden Grove, of whom Richard Vaughan was by Charles I., in the 19th of his reign, created Earl of Carberry, in Ireland, and Baron Emlyn. During the parliamentary war in the reign of that monarch, the castle was garrisoned for the king: it was besieged by the parliamentary forces in 1645, but was relieved by a body of royalists under the command of Colonel Gerard, who, attacking the besiegers, totally defeated them, killed two hundred, and took five hundred prisoners, with all their arms, ordnance, and baggage, and with the loss on his own part of only twenty-six men killed, besides others wounded: the castle continued in the family of the Vaughans, by the last of whom it was devised to the late Lord Cawdor, the father of Earl Cawdor, the present proprietor.

The town is beautifully situated on the southern bank of the Teivy, which here rushes with great impetuosity through its rocky channel, and over which is a handsome stone bridge of three arches, forming a communication between the counties of Cardigan and Carmarthen, and connecting the ancient borough of Atpar, in the former county, with this town, which consists principally of one irregular street, extending nearly a mile in length. The houses, of which several are handsome, are in general well built, and the cottages have an appearance of comfort and neatness not usually found in this part of the country: the town, though neither paved nor lighted, is well supplied with water, and the surrounding country, which is pleasingly varied, abounds with interesting objects and with romantic and picturesque scenery. The views are extensive and highly pleasing, and from several points the appearance of the town, with the capricious windings of the river and the beautiful remains of the ancient castle rising from its banks, is strikingly beautiful. The Teivy is celebrated for its salmon and sewin fishery, which is prosecuted with great success in small boats called coracles, which are peculiar to the principality. The market, which is amply supplied with provisions, and is remarkable for the great number of pigs exposed in it for sale, is on Friday, and is well attended. Fairs are held annually on March 23rd, May 10th, June 22nd, July 20th, August 20th, September 10th, October 19th, and November 22nd. This town has recently been made a polling-place in the election of knights for the shire. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Kenarth. The chapel, which was erected by public subscription about fifty years since, is a neat small edifice: a subscription is at present in progress for the erection of a church capable of accommodating a greater number of the inhabitants. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic Methodists. The remains of the ancient castle occupy an elevated ridge to the east of the town, on a peninsula formed by a bend in the river Teivy, which flows in a direct course till it nearly reaches the walls of that structure, but, suddenly reverting in a direction nearly parallel with its former course, for a considerable distance, winds majestically in front, leaving before the castle a long and beautiful meadow, and returns on the opposite side, with features of a new character, forcing its way over a rocky bed, and thus surrounding that ancient structure with a magnificent natural moat, which is double on that side where it first reaches the castle. The ruins consist chiefly of the principal gateway entrance, about fourteen feet in height, flanked by two octagonal towers, and possessing, from its situation immediately above the river, and its lightness and elegance, a peculiarly picturesque appearance in whatever direction it is viewed. This place gives the inferior title of Baron Emlyn to Earl Cawdor.

NEWCASTLE (LITTLE), a parish in the hundred of KEMMES, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,  $8\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. by E.) from Haverfordwest, containing 330 inhabitants. This place derives its name from an ancient mound near the church, called "the castle," and its distinguishing epithet from the inferiority of this fortification to a much older and more extensive work of the same kind, at a short distance from the village. The parish comprises a moderate tract of land, of which by far the greater part is enclosed and cultivated, the remainder being stony, barren, and unfit for tillage, especially the northern portion of it, which is hilly. Fairs are annually held in the village on May 6th and July 10th. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Thomas Williams, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Peter. In this parish was "Martel," the ancient seat of the family of Symmons before their removal to Llanstinan, of which nothing now remains but the site. Near the village is a spring, called Golden Well, which ebbs and flows regularly with the tide in St. George's channel, from which it is nine miles distant: the water is said to be efficacious in coughs, and in diseases of the eye. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £93. 15.

NEWCHAPEL, a chapelry in the parish of LLANDRINIO, upper division of the hundred of DEYTHUR, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (N.) from Welshpool. The population is returned with the parish. The name of this place is of obvious derivation. The chapel is conveniently situated on the confines of the parishes of Guilsfield, Llansantfraid, and Meivod, affording accommodation to the inhabitants of those several parishes who reside at a distance from the parish church: it is dedicated to the Holy Trinity, and is an ancient building in the early style of English architecture, in a very dilapidated state. The living is a perpetual curacy, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese of St. Asaph, endowed by the lord of the manor, the proprietor of the Penrhôs estate, and with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Major Gore, as lord of the manor. A free school has been established in this place for more than two hundred years: it was originally supported by the produce arising from lands which were given for that purpose by the neighbouring gentry, but, when the enclosure of waste lands took place, about sixty acres were allotted for the support of this establishment, and the lands previously given were returned to their original proprietors. The school, in which about forty children are gratuitously instructed, is open to all the inhabitants of the hundred of Deythur: there is a good house for the master. In the chapelry is one of Dr. Bray's parochial circulating libraries.

NEWCHURCH, or LLAN-NEWYDD, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of ELVET, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. W. by N.) from Carmarthen, containing 659 inhabitants. This place is stated to have been the scene of a pitched battle which was fought, about the year 72, between the Britons and the Romans under the command of Severinus, son of Severus, the Roman governor of Britain, who at that time resided at York. Severinus is supposed to have fallen in this battle; and a stone, formerly on the road side, but now removed and set up in the front court of Traws-Mawr, a farm belonging to David Davies, Esq., is said to have marked the spot where the battle took place. This stone, which is noticed by Camden, bore the inscription "Severini Fili Severi," the word sepulchrum or memoria being understood: it is described as "a rude pillar, erected near the highway, flattish, five or six feet high, and about three feet broad," by the last editors of Camden's Britannia, who, from the form of the letters and the rudeness of the stone, suspect it to be the epitaph of some person of Roman descent, but of a later period: the inscription has since that time been mutilated, and the word "fili" is no longer legible, that part of the stone having been chipped off. The parish is situated on the banks of the river Gwili, and on the turnpike road from Carmarthen to Newcastle-Emlyn, and comprises a large extent of arable and pasture land, which is fertile and in a good state of cultivation. The court leet for the hundred is held under Earl Cawdor, at Bwlch Newydd, in this parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £1400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of John Davies, Esq. The church, which was entirely rebuilt in 1829, is a remarkably neat edifice. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. In this parish are several barrows, probably covering the remains of those who fell in the battle noticed above; and to the east of the church, and near the remains of an ancient chapel, which has been converted into a barn, are a Roman encampment and the remains of a Roman road which passed through this parish to Fishguard. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £449. 6.

NEWCHURCH, a parish in the hundred of PAINSCASTLE, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES,  $6\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. W. by W.) from Kington, containing 164 inhabitants.

This parish is situated on the small river Arrow, nearly on the confines of Herefordshire, and is intersected by a road leading from Hay to New Radnor. The surface is hilly and the soil various: the lower lands, which are fertile and productive, are in a state of good cultivation; but the hills are but very partially cultivated, and almost destitute of timber. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5. 6. 8., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's: a small estate called Catriggin belongs to the rectory. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a small edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, without tower or spire, and possessing no architectural details of importance: it is situated on the right bank of the Arrow, in the midst of hills which are of forbidding rather than of pleasing aspect. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £86. 7.

NEWCHURCH in TÎR ABBOT, otherwise LLANDULAS, a parish in the hundred of BUILTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (N.E.) from Llandovery, containing 159 inhabitants. The whole of this parish was granted by Rhys ab Gruffydd, Prince of South Wales, to the monastery of Ystrad Flur, or Strata Florida, in the county of Cardigan, which he founded in the year 1164. In consequence of this grant the parish was distinguished by the appellation of Tîr yr Abad, or "the abbot's land;" and its present name, to which that appellation forms an adjunct, appears to have been derived from the erection of a church here in the year 1716. The name Llandulas, by which it is also known, and which, according to some authorities, is a corruption of Glân Dulas, under which it occurs in several public documents, appears to have originated in its situation on the bank of the little river Dulas, from which circumstance it was not unfrequently called Aber Dulas. The parish lies in a mountainous district, having the Epynt hills on the east; at the western extremity of the county, on the confines of Carmarthenshire, and comprises a considerable tract of hilly country, of which the soil is chiefly a turbary, interspersed with small enclosures producing thin crops of barley and oats, and some small pastures of indifferent herbage. The views from the higher grounds, embracing the counties of Brecknock and Carmarthen, are remarkable for their extent, if not for their picturesque beauty. The turnpike road from Builth to Llandovery passes through the parish, within a short distance of the village. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and with £200 in money and £20 per annum by Sackville Gwynne, Esq., who charged his estates with the annual payment of that sum to the officiating minister; and in the patronage of Colonel Gwynne, of Glânbrân, who is proprietor of the tithes. The minister and parishioners claim a right of exemption from episcopal jurisdiction and visitation, but have not strenuously maintained that privilege, as they prove wills and take out letters of administration at the Register Office at Brecknock. The church, a neat small edifice, was erected in 1716, at the sole charge of Sackville Gwynne, Esq., of Glânbrân. A Roman road, which was a branch of the Via

Helena, called by the Welsh Sarn Helen, passed through the parish, over the common called Llwydlo Vâch, and part of it may still be traced in some places. At a place called Pyllau-Da-Probert, forming part of the tenement of Trelath, in this parish, is a well, the water of which is strongly impregnated with sulphur, and similar in its properties to that of Llanwrtyd. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £55. 2.

NEWMARKET, a parish in the Media division of the hundred of PRESTATYN, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, on the old line of road between Chester and Holyhead, 6 miles (W. N. W.) from Holywell, containing 631 inhabitants. In Pope Nicholas' Taxation this place is called Rywlyvnwyd, by which name it is also mentioned in a record so late as the middle of the sixteenth century, having been formerly a chapelry in the parish of Dyserth. According to Mr. Pennant, its ancient name was Trelawnyd, "for which," says that distinguished antiquary, "I can find no satisfactory reason." He also hazards the conjecture, from the numerous tumuli and other sepulchral memorials visible in the neighbourhood, that it might be the scene of the slaughter of the Ordovices, the aboriginal inhabitants of this district, by the Romans under Agricola. In the early part of the last century the village was considerably enlarged through the care and exertions of John Wynne, Esq., of Gop, to whom the estate then belonged: it attained the distinction of a market-town, the market, now in disuse, having been held on Saturday. Newmarket has greatly declined from its former consequence, and presents now only the appearance of a village, though of considerable size. Lead-ore abounds in the parish, but the works have been discontinued. Fairs are held on the last Saturday in April, the third Saturday in July, the fourth Saturday in October, and the second Saturday in December. The petty sessions for the hundred take place here. The living is a perpetual curacy, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese, of St. Asaph, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph, who, as archdeacon, holds the rectory in commendam, and receives all tithes. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a small structure of modern date, standing within a spacious cemetery, finely shaded by lofty trees. About twenty yards from the principal entrance, on the south side, stands a tall and very beautiful cross, the upper part elegantly sculptured in high relief. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. A bequest of £40 per annum, for clothing, teaching, and apprenticing twenty poor children, was made by John Wynne, Esq., of Gop, in 1713, which, having become the subject of a suit in Chancery, has not yet been appropriated to the purpose contemplated by the worthy donor. Dr. Daniel Williams, a dissenting minister, founded a charity school in every county in North Wales, of which that for Flintshire was fixed here; these he endowed with £8 per annum each, except that of Wrexham, his native place, to which he gave £15 per annum, and provided a fund for apprenticing the children, with a premium of £5 for each. Among the tumuli and other relics of antiquity which lie thickly scattered throughout this interesting district, that called Copa'r'leni, or Gop Paulini, crowning the summit of a mountain about half a mile above the village, is the chief: it is composed of loose stones, covering an acre and a half of ground, and is about twelve yards in height; and although different conjectures have been raised regarding the purpose of its formation, there can be little doubt that it was erected over the remains of some renowned warrior, or chieftain, slain in battle, and may have served, in later times, as a beacon, since it commands a view of the whole range of encampments on the south and west, the Irish sea on the north, and the æstuaries of the Dee and Mersey on the east. Part of the brow of the hill is called Brÿn y Saethau, or "the Hill of Arrows," intimating that it was the station of the archers in some of those engagements which, in the early period of British history, deluged this neighbourhood with blood, but the direful calamities of which have not been recorded by the historian, and are now involved in the obscurity of ages. A greater number of these tumuli, of the ordinary size, may be seen in the tract intervening between this place and Caerwys than in any other in North Wales; several of them, having been opened, were found to contain urns, in which were burnt ashes, charcoal, &c., and many hundreds have been levelled in agricultural operations. Clawdd Offa, or Offa's Dyke, passes very near the village, and forms the boundary line between this parish and that of Llanasaph. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £182. 13.

NEW MOTE, or NEW MOAT, a parish in the hundred of DUNGLEDDY, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 10 miles (N. E.) from Haverfordwest, containing 331 inhabitants. This place derives its name from an artificial mount, which is within a short distance of the church, and is entirely surrounded by a deep moat, which may be easily filled with water. It is supposed to have been originally constructed by the Flemings who settled in this part of the principality, in the reign of Henry II., and obtained by force the hundreds of Castlemartin and Rhôs, together with a considerable portion of that of Dungledy. The parish is pleasantly situated on a branch of the river Cleddy, and comprises a considerable portion of meadow, arable, and pasture land, which is all enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The surrounding country is pleasingly diversified, and displays some interesting features of mountain scenery. The ancient mansion of the Scourfields, who resided in this parish from the reign of Edward I. till within the last sixty years, when they removed to Robeston Hall, near Milford, has been taken down, and the proprietor is now erecting a spacious and elegant mansion on the same site, to which the family will remove when it is completed: the house, which is surrounded with thriving plantations and with groves of ancient timber, is delightfully situated at the foot of the southern declivity of the Precelly range of mountains, and commands a fine view over the whole of the lower part of the county. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £2. 4. 7., and in the patronage of W. H. Scourfield, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Nicholas, is an ancient and venerable structure, consisting of a nave, chancel, and one aisle, with a square embattled tower at the west end: the chancel appears to have been very richly embellished at no very distant period, but has of late been very much neglected; it contains several handsome monuments to the Scourfield family, of which some are of great antiquity. Near the mount above noticed are the remains of a very extensive Roman camp, enclosing a quadrilateral area three hundred yards in diameter, and situated on a gentle declivity towards the south: a considerable portion of the northern rampart has been dug up, but the remains are sufficient to mark out the four sides of the camp with tolerable accuracy: the road from Narberth to Fishguard passes through its centre. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £146. 2.

NEWPORT, a sea-port, market town, and parish, in the hundred of KEMMES, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 19½ miles (N. E. by N.) from Haverfordwest, and 242 (W. by N.) from London, containing 1798 inhabitants. The ancient British name of this place, Trêddraeth, signifying literally "the town on the sands," appears to have been derived from its situation on a sandy beach of considerable extent, which intervenes between it and the bay of Newport. The town is indebted for its origin and early importance to the descendants of Martin de Tours, the first lord of Kemmes, which territory he had wrested from the Welsh by conquest, and erected into a lordship marcher, and whose son William erected a castle at this place, which he made the head of his barony, and invested with many privileges. This same nobleman granted the inhabitants a charter of incorporation, vesting the government of the town in a mayor and burgesses, to whom he gave an extensive grant of lands, the privilege of holding a weekly market, and several valuable immunities, all which were confirmed by a charter granted by his son Nicholas. The lordship was entirely independent of the palatinate of Pembroke; the lord held his courts in the castle of this place; all writs were issued in his own name exclusively, and not either in that of the Earl of Pembroke, or even of the king of England. In 1215, the castle was taken by Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, but it soon afterwards reverted to its original proprietors, whose descendants continued to hold it, together with the lordship in which they exercised jura regalia, till the time of Henry VIII., when all such jurisdictions were abolished. Under the protection of its ancient lords the town continued to increase in extent and importance, and enjoyed many additional privileges, of which some were granted to the barony in the reign of Elizabeth. It had become extremely populous, and carried on an extensive woollen manufacture, about the commencement of the sixteenth century, when a pestilential disease occasioned such mortality among its inhabitants, that its market was discontinued, or rather transferred to the neighbouring town of Fishguard, the trade of the port ceased, and the town fell into decay. The market has been re-established, and some little addition to its trade has gradually taken place since that period; but the town has never recovered its former importance. It stands on the high road from Cardigan to Fishguard, and is pleasantly situated at the mouth of the river Nevers, which falls into St. George's channel at Newport bay, and on rising ground ascending gradually to the Carn Ingle mountain, which shelters it from the south-easterly and south-westerly winds, and rises to a considerable height beyond the town: it consists of numerous small streets irregularly formed, neither lighted nor paved, but naturally well supplied with excellent water. The houses, with some few exceptions, are indifferently built, but, from intermixture of numerous trees with the buildings, the town has, at a small distance, a pleasingly rural appearance; and the surrounding scenery, in which its venerable church and the picturesque remains of its ancient castle form prominent and interesting features, renders the distant view of it strikingly beautiful. The trade principally carried on is the working of some extensive quarries of slate, with which the neighbouring coast abounds, and of which great quantities are shipped to various places, the vessels being enabled to approach close to the quarries, and to receive the slates from the overhanging cliffs; and in the burning of lime for the supply of the neighbouring districts, in which a considerable portion of the population is employed. A vein of alum shale is said to lie within a short distance of the town, but it has never been worked. There is a good salmon fishery on the river Nevers, which in favourable seasons is very productive, and is carried on with advantage; a herring fishery also exists here, but the demand is so inconsiderable that it is not productive of much benefit to the persons engaged in it. This port is subject to the custom-house of Cardigan: the principal exports are corn and butter, and the produce of the quarries; the chief imports are coal, culm, and limestone. The harbour, which is small, has its entrance partially obstructed by a sand bank; but it affords good shelter to the coasting vessels employed in the trade, and to the boats engaged in the fisheries. A compact and well protected bay, on the south and east, stretches out before the town, from which it derives its name. The market is on Friday; and fairs are held annually on June 27th and October 16th. The town retains the ancient form of government which it held under the charter of incorporation granted by William, son of Martin de Tours, and afterwards confirmed by his son Nicholas; and a mayor is still nominated by the lord of the manor, from three persons elected for that purpose by a majority of the burgesses. Courts leet and baron are held twice in the year; and the petty sessions for the hundred take place here on the first Friday in every month. Newport has recently been made a polling-place in the election of a knight for the shire.

The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £16, endowed with £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Thomas Lloyd, Esq., of Bronwydd, lord of the manor. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is an ancient and venerable cruciform structure, partly in the early style of English architecture, with a square tower at the west end; the roofs of the nave, chancel, and transepts are of carved oak, and are supported on ranges of plain pointed arches; and in the chancel are two stone canopies plainly wrought: over the nave is a richly wrought open spire for a bell, and the windows exhibit tracery of considerable elegance. The church has recently received an addition of four hundred and eighteen sittings, towards defraying the expense of which the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels have contributed £200, in consideration of which grant two hundred and eighteen sittings are free. On the west side of the porch are the ruins of a detached building, said to have been the record-office of the town. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic Methodists. A school conducted on the National system is supported here on the foundation of the late Mrs. Bevan, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children: it is a permanent establishment, and the central school, in which are prepared the teachers who superintend the several circulating branch schools connected with the foundation. This plan of circulating instruction was originally projected by the Rev. Griffith Jones, of Llandowror, in the county of Carmarthen, in the article on which parish a more detailed account of it is given. On an elevated knoll, rising abruptly at the extremity of the principal street of the town, are the remains of the ancient castle, consisting principally of one of the circular bastions which defended the grand entrance, the other having fallen down some years since, and some portions of the dungeons, between which and the town was a subterraneous communication, discovered within the last few years; the bottom of it was flagged, and the sides and the roof were secured by smooth stones. The castle was surrounded by a moat, and though the ruins bespeak it to have been originally occupied as a seat of baronial magnificence rather than a fortress, it was no doubt well adapted to both purposes, and in its general construction appears to have combined strength with elegance. The bay of Newport, bounded by the headlands of Dinas and Ceibwr, opens beautifully in front, rendering the situation peculiarly delightful. Beyond the site of the castle rises the lofty rocky eminence called Carn Ingle, where St. Brynach, to whom many churches in Wales are dedicated, is said to have passed his life in religious seclusion, and to have conversed with angels, from which fabulous tradition this place has been called also "Mons Angelorum." There are numerous Druidical remains in the vicinity; and near the mansion of Llwynygwaer, but within the limits of this parish, is one of the most perfect cromlechs in the principality, though on a small scale. On a hill connected with Carn Ingle there is a large stone, called Morris' Grave. According to Speed, there was anciently a house of Augustine friars at this place, but no particulars of its foundation or history have been preserved. The poor are maintained by an average annual expenditure amounting to £296. 15.

NEW-QUAY, a small port in the parish of LLAN-LLWCHAIRN, hundred of MOYTHEN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 15 miles (N. W. by W.) from Lampeter. The population is included in the return for the parish. This place is advantageously situated on the shore of Cardigan bay, and affords good anchorage to vessels of small tonnage. The haven is securely sheltered from the westerly winds, and, if improved to the extent of which it is susceptible, might easily be made a safe retreat for ships of considerable burden. The pier might be enlarged, for which purpose a subscription has been opened with success; but the attempt has been hitherto frustrated by the want of a sufficient title to the land, which would be requisite to carry that object into effect. There are at present from sixty to seventy vessels belonging to this port, averaging from forty to fifty tons' burden each, and employing from one hundred and fifty to two hundred men. Fish of very superior quality is found in abundance on this part of the coast, soles, turbot, and oysters, being taken in great numbers during the season; a good herring fishery may also be established with advantage. The village is of considerable size, and is inhabited chiefly by persons connected with the business of the port. A fair is annually held on November 12th.

NEWTON, a parish in the hundred of NARBERTH, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. by S.) from Narberth, containing 42 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated near the road leading from Tenby, by Canaston bridge, to Haverfordwest, and on the left bank of the Eastern Cleddy, comprises but a moderate area, of which the greater part is enclosed and cultivated, and of the remainder one-half is uncultivated, and the other woodland: the surface is agreeably diversified, and the scenery enriched with thriving woods. In some parts the parish abounds with iron-stone; and there were formerly some extensive iron-works carried on with great success at Black Pool, in this parish, on the banks of the Eastern Cleddy, where is still the shipping-place for the town of Narberth, which afforded employment to a considerable portion of the inhabitants, but they have been discontinued for several years. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Charles Deeds, Esq. The church, which is situated at a small distance from the village, possesses no architectural details of interest. An average annual expenditure of £67. 7. is applied for the support of the poor.

NEWTON-NOTTAGE, a parish, comprising the hamlets of Newton and Nottage, which separately maintain their own poor, in the hundred of NEWCASTLE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. S. W.) from Bridgend, and containing 626 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the shore of the Bristol channel, comprises a tract of land of which a considerable portion is unenclosed and uncultivated. The sea has encroached greatly on the shore, and a considerable portion of the parish, which within the recollection of persons now living formerly afforded excellent pasturage for sheep, is now covered with sand. A few persons resort to this place for the benefit of sea-bathing. Iron-stone is procured to a limited extent on Newton Down, and both lead-ore and manganese have been found in the white limestone of this parish: a facility of conveyance and of communication with the limestone and freestone quarries, and with the other mines in the vicinity, is afforded by the Dyfryn Llynvi and Porthcawl railway. This railway commences at the little harbour of Porthcawl, in this parish, which has been greatly improved by the construction of a breakwater extending several yards into the sea, and proceeds by Nottage village to North and South Cornelly, and Pyle, whence it pursues an easterly course to the iron-works at Cevn Cribwr, where it is joined by the Bridgend railway, and, taking a northerly direction in a line parallel with the western bank of the river Llynvi, passes the village of Llangonoyd, and, crossing the river at Typhylly Chwyth, terminates at Dyfryn Llynvi, extending in its whole course a distance of seventeen miles. From Newton Down may be obtained a fine view of Penllyne castle, near Cowbridge, to the east, and to the west, over Swansea bay, the whitewashed habitations about Oystermouth and the country adjacent to Swansea. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £17. 4. 7., and in the patronage of Mrs. Knight, for two turns, and Calvert Jones, Esq., for one: the former had the last, and is entitled to the next, presentation. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is an ancient and venerable structure, displaying portions in the successive styles of English architecture, with a massive square tower: the number of sittings has been recently enlarged by the erection of a gallery, in which there are forty free: the pulpit appears to have been formed out of one solid stone, and is rudely carved with a representation of the scourging of our Saviour. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic Methodists. A school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children is about to be established in the parish upon Dr. Bell's system; and a Sunday school is supported by the rector in the village of Nottage. Some traces of the Julia Strata Maritima may be discerned on Newton Down, a little to the left of the turnpike road, in its course towards Nidum (Neath). Near the church is a curious well, noticed by Camden as ebbing and flowing in opposition to the tide, being full at low water and empty at high water: various conjectures have been formed to account for this phenomenon, which may be satisfactorily explained on the principle of a natural syphon. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £136. 12., of which sum, £50. 12. is raised on the hamlet of Newton.

NEWTOWN, a newly created borough, market town, and parish, in the upper division of the hundred of NEWTOWN, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (S. W. by W.) from Montgomery, and 179 (W. N. W.) from London, on the road from Welshpool to Aberystwith, containing 4550 inhabitants, and with Penyglodva, nearly 6000. Very little is known either of the origin or of the early history of this place, which since the beginning of the present century has, from the celebrity of its flannel manufacture, risen into importance and obtained a distinguished rank among the manufacturing and commercial towns in this part of the principality. The name, which is synonymous with Trênewydd, that given to it by the Welsh, is evidently in allusion to a somewhat recent date, but whether with reference to its origin, or to any more ancient town which previously existed near the site, has not been ascertained. On the banks of the Severn, at the distance of about a mile, on the left of the road to Welshpool, are some remains of a British encampment, but no historical event is recorded which in any way connects it with the town; and on the right of the same road are traces of the Roman way from Caer-Sws to the Gaer near Montgomery. At the former of these places coins, bricks, and other relics of Roman antiquity, have been discovered; and there are some remains of the castle of Dôlvorwyn, near the town. During the civil war of the seventeenth century, Charles I., on his way to Chester, was hospitably entertained for two days and two nights by Sir John Pryce, at Newtown Hall, the residence of that family since the time of Henry VI., on his departure from which he narrowly escaped being made prisoner by Sir Thomas Myddelton. The town is situated in a beautiful valley on the banks of the river Severn, and consists of one principal street, intersected by several smaller streets; the old houses are in general of timber and brick, but those of modern erection are of handsome appearance. A substantial bridge of stone over the Severn was completed in 1827, in lieu of an ancient bridge of wood which stood near the site: this new structure, which is called the Long Bridge, consists of three arches of more than sixty feet span, and connects the parish of Newtown with Pen-y-gloddva, Frankwell, and the Basin, which are in the parish of Llanllwchaiarn, having been erected within the last seven years on the opposite side of the river, and now form part of the town: the arches and the parapets are of grey freestone, and the piers and spondrils of blue stone found in the neighbourhood: this bridge was erected by the county, at an expense of more than £4000. A stone bridge of one arch was built, in 1823, over the town brook, on the road to Welshpool, which, by way of distinction, is called the Short Bridge. The town, which appears to be more flourishing, and to be rising into greater importance, than any in North Wales, is indifferently paved, partially lighted with gas, and amply supplied with water. Considerable improvements have taken place within the last few years, among which is the construction of a new road leading through the heart of the county of Radnor to Builth, and forming the most direct road from Chester, and the northern parts of Wales, to the south-western part of England. A book society was established in 1830, which is liberally supported by subscription among the inhabitants of the town and the immediate vicinity. The environs abound with pleasing and romantic scenery, and a fine view of the town is obtained from the summits of the hills on the north and south sides. At the distance of about a mile and a half on the road to Builth there is a picturesque and strikingly beautiful spot, which is much resorted to by the inhabitants: from the summit of a shelving mass of rock, eighty feet high, a stream of water rushes with impetuosity, forming in its descent a fine cascade, and winds at the base through a glen which is richly planted with shrubs and trees of various kinds.

The staple trade of this place and its neighbourhood is the manufacture of flannel, which was first introduced about forty years since, and for several years conducted upon a small scale, the average number of pieces not exceeding ten per week. The superior fineness of the Welsh wool, and the peculiar softness of the water of the Severn, afforded every facility for conducting this manufacture to advantage; and the skill and care bestowed by the masters on the finishing of the goods have distinguished the flannels of Newtown for unrivalled excellence of quality. The manufacture is now carried on to a very considerable extent, affording employment to more than three thousand persons in the town and neighbourhood, in which not less than fifty factories have been established, working fifty thousand spindles, one thousand two hundred looms, and fifty carding-engines, which are propelled by water and steam. The average number of pieces, each containing one hundred and sixty yards, at present manufactured is two hundred and fifty per week, which are of the finest quality, and obtain a ready sale in the market, which is henceforward to be held for that purpose, every alternate Thursday, in a spacious building recently erected, and opened on September 6th, 1832, the proprietors of which are shareholders of £25 each. Hitherto the market for the sale of flannels has been held at Welshpool, but the manufacturers and other inhabitants of this place have erected the above-named building, with the view of withdrawing it entirely from that town, and establishing it permanently here. Connected with these factories there are not less than twenty fulling-mills and several extensive bleaching-grounds. Machinery of every description is also made in the town, as well for general purposes as for the improvement of the manufacture, into which it has been introduced with complete success. A foundry upon an extensive scale has been erected, in which castings of every kind connected with the works, and articles of every description, are made: there are also potteries for the coarser kinds of earthenware, and several tanneries and malt-kilns, a considerable trade being carried on in malt; and it is in contemplation to erect a carpet-manufactory in the town. An act of parliament was obtained, in 1814, for extending the Montgomeryshire canal from Garthmill to this town, a distance of eight miles, which has been carried into effect with great benefit to the trade of the place: this new line of inland navigation, which is called the Western branch of the Montgomeryshire canal, was opened on the 1st of March, 1819, and, in the course of the following year, the basin, which is three hundred feet in length and one hundred feet wide, was completed. Several convenient wharfs and yards have been erected for storing coal, bricks, slates, timber, and other articles of merchandise, and numerous lime-kilns have been built along the banks of this canal, which has contributed to facilitate the conveyance of the heavier articles of manufacture, and to supply the neighbourhood with commodities of every kind. The markets, which are abundantly supplied and numerously attended, are on Tuesday, for corn and provisions, and on Saturday for provisions only. The market-hall is a plain brick building, situated in the centre of the principal street: the lower part is appropriated to the use of the corn market, and the upper to the sale of wool, of which considerable quantities are purchased every market day. It is in contemplation to take down this building, which obstructs the principal thoroughfare, leaving room only for a single waggon to pass with difficulty on each side, and to erect another in a more convenient situation. The tolls of the market belong to Viscount Clive, as lord of the manor of Cedewen, in which the town is included. The fairs are on the first Tuesday in February, the last Tuesday in March, the first Tuesday in May, June 24th, the last Tuesday in August, October 24th, and December 16th: of these the May, June, and October fairs are very large, and amply supplied with horses, cattle, sheep, pigs, and all kinds of wares; at the October fair, of which the first day is always for sheep and pigs, more than eighteen thousand sheep are generally sold. By the late act for amending the representation of the people Newtown has been constituted a contributory borough, uniting with the other boroughs in the county in the return of a member to parliament: the right of election is vested in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act directs: the present number of such tenements within the limits of the borough, which are described in the Appendix to this work, is two hundred and sixty-two. The town is within the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, who hold a petty session for the division on the first Monday in every month; and constables and other officers are appointed at the court leet of the lord of the manor, which is held annually at Easter. It is supposed that the county gaol was formerly in this town, and near the market-place is an ancient building, now converted into a public house, which is still called the "Old Gaol," but will probably be taken down with a view to the improvement of this part of the town.

The living is a rectory, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese, of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £8. 15., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture, with a low square tower surmounted by a belfry of wood: the interior consists of two aisles, separated by a central range of pillars and pointed arches of wood, which support the roof, and a chancel, separated from the body of the church by an elaborately carved and richly gilt and painted screen, which was removed hither from Abbey Cwm-Hir, in the county of Radnor: there are some marble monuments, chiefly to the family of Pryce of Newtown Hall; and numerous texts of scripture in frames are hung round the walls. His Majesty's commissioners proposed a grant of £4000, for the erection of an additional church, and land for a burial-ground adjoining the site, on condition that the inhabitants would raise among themselves £1500 by subscription; but from some cause the proposition has not been yet carried into effect. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Welsh Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. An academy for the education of young men for the ministry among the Independents was removed to this town from Llanvyllin, in 1821, which, together with a grammar school attached to it, is supported chiefly by the congregational fund under the superintendence of the Board in London. There are Sunday schools in connexion with the established church and the several dissenting congregations, in which about one thousand four hundred children are instructed. A dispensary was instituted in 1825, by William Pugh, Esq., of Bryn Llywarch, who, during the first year, defrayed the whole expense of its establishment, amounting to more than £200: it is now supported by general subscription among the inhabitants, and is productive of great benefit to the numerous families employed in the manufactures of the place. In a fine park adjacent to the town, on the west, stands Newtown Hall, the seat of the Rev. G. A. Evors; and the surrounding country is enlivened by numerous other gentlemen's residences, among which may be mentioned Black Hall, the seat of Charles Jones, Esq.; Bryn Llywarch, that of W. Pugh, Esq.; Dôlerw, that of W. Lutener, Esq.; Dôlvorgan, that of John Edwards, Esq.; Dôlvorwyn Hall, that of the Rev. J. Price; Glân Havren, that of Mrs. Herbert; and Cregynog, that of C. H. Tracey, Esq. The poor are maintained by an average annual expenditure amounting to £1013. 13.

NICHOLAS (ST.), a parish in the hundred of DINAS-POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (W. by S.) from Cardiff, containing 351 inhabitants. This parish, which takes its name from the dedication of its church, is situated on the turnpike road from Cardiff to Swansea, and comprises a considerable tract of arable and pasture land, of which the whole, with the exception of only a small portion, is enclosed and cultivated. The soil is in general fertile and productive; and the surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied, and in some parts picturesque. Dyfryn House, formerly the seat of the ancient family of Price, and now, by marriage with the heiress of that family, the property and residence of the Hon. William Booth Grey, is agreeably situated in a retired spot, about a mile southward from the village: the grounds are tastefully laid out, and comprehend a pleasing variety of scenery. Cottrel, late the property of Miss Gwynett, and now the residence of Admiral Sir Charles Tyler, K. C. B., to whose eldest son, Capt. Tyler, R. N., it will revert on the death of the Earl of Clarendon, is pleasantly situated, and commands from the rear of the house a fine view of part of the picturesque Vale of Ely, with Hensol castle and the grounds attached to it on the western bank of the river. Fairs, chiefly for cattle and sheep, are annually held in the village on May 19th, August 21st, and December 17th; and the petty sessions for the hundred are also held at this place. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £11. 10., and in the patronage of the Hon. William Booth Grey. The church is an ancient and venerable structure, with a tower at the west end. There are places of worship for Baptists and Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. A school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children upon the National system is supported by Mrs. Grey and the rector of the parish. On the right of the road leading from the village to Dyfryn House is an ancient cromlech, said to be the largest monument of the kind in the kingdom: it consists of large flat stones nearly six feet in height, enclosing an area of seventeen feet in length and thirteen in breadth, upon which rests a table stone, twenty-four feet long, and varying in breadth from seventeen to ten feet. In a field by the road side, immediately opposite to Cottrel Lodge gate, is a single stone of the same origin, lying in an inclined position. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £190. 19.

NICHOLAS' (ST.), otherwise MONKTON, a parish in the hundred of CASTLEMARTIN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, adjoining the town of Pembroke, and containing 1128 inhabitants. This place appears to have derived the name of Monkton from the circumstance of Arnulph de Montgomery, the founder of Pembroke castle, having, in 1089, granted its church, situated within the precincts of that fortress, together with twenty carucates of land in this parish, to the abbey of St. Martin at Seyes in Normandy; soon after the date of which grant, a priory of monks of the Benedictine order, dedicated to St. Nicholas, was founded at this place, and made a cell to that foreign abbey. William and Walter Mareschal, Earls of Pembroke, were great benefactors to this establishment, which continued to flourish till the reign of Edward III., when that monarch seized it, with the other Alien establishments, into his own hands. It was restored by Henry IV., but, being again seized, it was granted by Henry VI. to Humphrey Duke of Gloucester, who, in the 21st of that reign, gave it as a cell to the abbey of St. Albans, which grant was confirmed by Henry, in the 27th of his reign. It continued subordinate to that abbey till the dissolution, when its revenue was estimated, according to Speed, at £113. 2. 6., and, according to Dugdale, at £57. 9. 3.: it was granted, in the 37th of Henry VIII., to John Vaughan and Catherine his wife. The parish, which is bounded on the north by a creek of Milford Haven, extending up to the town of Pembroke, is situated to the south-west of that borough, and comprises a considerable tract of land, which is wholly enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The soil is in general fertile, and the inhabitants, with the exception of those only of the village of Monkton, are wholly employed in agriculture. The surrounding scenery is finely diversified, and the views, extending over the sea and the adjacent country, abound with interest. In this parish is Orielton, an ancient mansion supposed to have been originally built by one of the followers of Arnulph de Montgomery, called Oriel, from whom it derived its name, and now the property of Sir John Owen, Bart. In the reign of Henry II. it belonged to the family of the Wyrriotts, in whose possession it continued till the reign of Elizabeth, when it passed by marriage with the heiress of that family to Sir Hugh Owen, Bart., who, dying in 1809, left his large estates to his kinsman, John Lord, Esq., who, assuming the name of Owen, was created a baronet, and is now lord-lieutenant of the county. It has been greatly improved by the present proprietor, and is a handsome mansion, occupying an elevated situation, finely sheltered by thick woods, and ornamented with thriving plantations. There were anciently several other seats and family mansions in this parish, some of which have entirely disappeared, and the rest have been converted into farm-houses. Courts leet are held by the lord of the manor, at which constables are appointed for the whole of the parish, who act under the authority of the lord, independently of the corporation of Pembroke. Fairs are held annually in the village on May 14th and November 22nd. The mayor of Pembroke exercises the jurisdiction of coroner within the village, which by the late Boundary Act has been included, for electoral purposes, within the limits of that borough, as forming a suburb to the town. The living is a discharged vicarage, consolidated with those of St. Mary and St. Michael Pembroke, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, and in the patronage of Sir John Owen, Bart. The church, dedicated to St. Nicholas, formerly the conventual church of the priory, and all that remains of that establishment, is an ancient and venerable structure, partly in the Norman, and partly in the early English, style of architecture, with a Lady chapel at the eastern end, now roofless, but having four handsome windows on the southern side, and one in the eastern end. The nave is vaulted with stone, and the present chancel formerly communicated with the chapel of the Virgin by an archway which has been closed for ages: the pavement of the church consists partly of curious glazed bricks; and the modern font rests on the fragment of a beautiful clustered column of remote antiquity. On each side of the ruined Lady chapel is a canopied recess for a recumbent figure, and to the right of the altar are stalls for two officiating priests. There are numerous tumuli in various parts of the parish, evidently sepulchral, and probably raised over the remains of some of the ancient defenders of the soil against the Norman invaders: the greatest number is at a place called Dry Burrows, where is the largest group of these ancient monuments in the county. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £323. 18.

NICHOLAS' (ST.), a parish in the hundred of DEWISLAND, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (W. by S.) from Fishguard, containing 315 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated in the north-western part of the county, and at no great distance from St. George's channel, comprises a moderate portion of good arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation: from the high grounds in the north and south parts of it some fine views are obtained of St. George's channel. It constitutes the only prebend, in the cathedral church of St. David's, to which a residence in that city is attached, and is usually called St. Nicholas Pen y Voecs: the prebend is valued in the king's books at £5. 4. 6½., and is in the patronage of the Bishop. The living is a discharged vicarage, annexed, with that of Granston, to the vicarage of Mathrey, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's: the great tithes of the parish are held on lease by George Rock, Esq., of Butter Hill. The church, dedicated to St. Nicholas, is not remarkable for any architectural details. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians. In the fence of the churchyard is a stone, about a yard and a half in length, and three-quarters of a yard in breadth, with the inscription TVNCCFTACCVX SORDAAR!! HICIA CIT+. At no great distance from the church, just above the village of Trellŷs, are the remains of an ancient cromlech, the table stone of which rests only upon two supporters. The poor are maintained by an average annual expenditure amounting to £95. 3.

NICHOLASTON, a parish in the hundred of SWANSEA, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 11 miles (W. S. W.) from Swansea, containing 92 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Nicholas, is situated on the shore of Oxwich bay, by which it is bounded on the south, and comprises but a small tract of arable and pasture land, of which only a comparatively trifling portion is unenclosed and uncultivated. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied, and is enriched with thriving timber; and the views from the eminence called Cevn Brŷn, over Penrice Castle and grounds, and from the cliffs which impend over the bay, are interesting and diversified. The hamlet of Mansel-field, in this parish, from which place one of the churchwardens and one of the overseers of the poor are invariably chosen, derived its name from the Mansel family, one of whom, William Mansel, Esq., of Penrice Castle, was proprietor of it in the reign of Henry VI.: it is situated at a short distance from the village of Nicholaston, and comprises about seventy acres. The living is a discharged rectory, consolidated with that of Port-Eynon, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5. 11. 0½., and in the patronage of C. R. M. Talbot, Esq., who is the principal proprietor of land in the parish. The church is a small plain edifice, possessing no architectural details of importance, and is situated near the summit of the cliffs which overhang the centre of Oxwich bay. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £8. 7.

NODDVA, a township in the parish of DAROWEN, hundred of MACHYNLLETH, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (E. by N.) from Machynlleth, containing 486 inhabitants. The name of this township signifies a place of refuge, from which it is supposed that the parochial church, which is situated within its limits, and a certain tract around it, now described by three stones, once afforded sanctuary to offenders against the laws. Each of these stones stands about one mile from the church; one of them, called Carreg Noddva, or "the stone of refuge" to the east; another, rising nearly three yards above the ground, to the south; and the third, which is smaller, to the north-east. Upon the summit of Vron Gôch, a hill situated about half a mile westward from the church, are vestiges of an ancient intrenchment; and there is a tumulus on the top of another hill, called Bwlch gelli lās: near the latter, on the sheepwalk of the farm Berllan Dêg, a celt and various brazen military weapons were discovered a few years ago.

NOLTON, a parish in the hundred of RHÔS, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (W. by N.) from Haverfordwest, containing 208 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the eastern shore of St. Bride's bay, and comprises a moderate portion of arable and pasture land, which was enclosed under the provisions of an act of parliament in 1759. The surface is varied and in some parts hilly; the soil is in general productive, and the inhabitants are chiefly employed in agriculture. Stone, of a quality not inferior to that of Portland, abounds in the parish, and some quarries have been opened, which might have been worked to great advantage, had due care been taken to find out the proper stratum. The repairs and alterations of the cathedral church of St. David's were to have been wholly executed with this stone, but the contractor for the buttresses having taken that stratum of the stone which lay nearest the surface, instead of sinking lower for that which was of the best quality, the intention was abandoned. The small haven near the village of Drewson, in this parish, afforded a facility for conveying the produce of the quarries to its destination, and probably, when further trial has been made of the quality of the stone taken from the proper stratum, it may again become a shipping-place for that material. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4. 2. 11., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church is dedicated to St. Madoc: there was formerly a chapel of ease at the village of Drewson, but it has been for some time in ruins. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. At Drewson, properly Druidston, were some Druidical remains, from which that small hamlet originally derived its name; the stones which composed the circle were removed in 1740, and have been used for building purposes. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £63. 18.

NORTHOP (NORTH-HOPE), a parish in the Northop division of the hundred of COLESHILL, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (N. by E.) from Mold, and 3 (S. by E.) from Flint, containing 3026 inhabitants. This place, which has obtained its present appellation in contradistinction to East, or Queen's Hope, was by the Welsh called "Llan-Eurgain," from the dedication of its first church to St. Eurgain, niece of St. Asaph, the second bishop of the see which from him derived its name. The parish, which is of very considerable extent, is situated on the æstuary of the Dee, by which it is bounded on the north-east, and is traversed by the roads from Chester to Holyhead, and from Mold to Holywell, which cross each other near the church. It comprises more than thirteen thousand acres of good arable and pasture land, which are enclosed and cultivated, exclusively of several thousand acres of sands on the æstuary of the river, which, being almost entirely dry at low water, might at a comparatively small expense be brought into cultivation. The village, which is large, is pleasantly situated in a fertile and beautiful tract of country, abounding with finely varied and highly picturesque scenery, and is surrounded on all sides by elegant villas and handsome seats, inhabited by opulent families, among which the most conspicuous is, Soughton Hall, the residence of W. I. Bankes, Esq. The parish is rich in mineral treasure: coal and lead-ore have been worked here for several centuries; an extensive colliery is still carried on in the hamlet of Soughton, and several shafts are now being sunk on the Northop Hall estate, in the hamlets of Northop and Kelsterton. In the hamlet of Caervallwch are some very extensive lead mines, which have been worked from the earliest times, but are now rapidly declining, in consequence of the low price of lead. A very large ale and porter brewery, the first of the kind established in this county, was erected in the hamlet of Kelsterton, in the year 1818, and is conducted upon a very extensive scale and with great advantage to the proprietors: from this establishment part of the city of Chester, and this and the adjoining counties are supplied. In the hamlet of Golvryn a large quay and pier have been constructed, within the last few years, by the Irish Coal Company, and vessels sail regularly from this place for Liverpool, London, and Dublin, and the ports of North Wales. The channel made by the River Dee Company passes for several miles through the parish; but the lands on the north side are still occasionally inundated.

The living consists of a rectory and a vicarage, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese, of St. Asaph: the rectory, which is a sinecure, was annexed, by an act passed in the 6th of Queen Anne's reign, to the bishoprick of St. Asaph, in lieu of mortuaries, and is rated in the king's books at £49. 14. 9½.; and the vicarage, to which is annexed the parochial chapelry of Flint, is endowed, rated in the king's books at £14. 6. 8., and is in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The present church, erected in 1571, and dedicated to St. Peter, is a spacious and embattled structure, with a lofty and elegant tower, ninety-eight feet high, and consists of a nave, chancel, and north aisle, with a sepulchral chapel adjoining the latter, dedicated to St. Mary, and containing several ancient monuments: of these, the most ancient is one having the effigy of Edwyn ab Gronow, Prince of Tegengl, who died in 1073: another has the effigy of a knight in complete armour, with the hands crossed upon the breast, and a lion at the feet; the shield bears a cross with five mullets: a third monument is to the memory of a female, whose effigy is well sculptured, having the head protected by an elaborately wrought canopy; from the neck depends a massive chain, and around the whole is a mutilated inscription, of which only the date MCCCCXXXII. is legible. In digging a grave near the communion table, in 1798, was found an ancient figure of an armed knight, well sculptured: the armour is of the period of the reign of Richard II. There are places of worship in the village for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists; at Rhôs Esmor, one each for Baptists and Calvinistic Methodists, for which latter denomination there are also one at Soughton, and one at Golvtyn. The free grammar school was founded in 1606, by William Smith, L.L.B., who endowed it with £20 per annum for the salary of a master, and with £2 to a poor boy of each of the towns and parishes of Northop, Flint, Whitford, Cwm, and St. Asaph. Dr. D. Ellis augmented the endowment with £5 per annum, for the better support of the master; and Owen Jones, Esq., in 1658, bequeathed all his lands and tenements in Northop to the vicar and churchwardens, in trust for the maintenance of seven poor boys of this parish in the above school, who should receive £4 per annum each for five years, and at the expiration of that time be apprenticed with a fee of £8. Previously to the year 1815, the rents of the property of the school had amounted to £131 per annum, and there was at that time a surplus of £547 in the hands of the trustees. By a decree of the court of Chancery, issued in that year, five more boys were added to the establishment, the annual payment to each was increased to £6, and the apprentice fee to £12; an addition of £10 per annum was also made to the salary of the master, and the remaining surplus was ordered to be distributed in weekly or monthly portions to the poor not receiving parochial aid. A National school, in which one hundred and fifty children receive gratuitous instruction, was established in 1823, by subscription, aided by a grant of £100 from the parent society: it is principally supported by subscription, but has an endowment of £650, which sum was raised in contributions for that purpose by the late vicar. There are various charitable donations and bequests in money and land, the produce of which is duly appropriated to the relief of the poor, according to the intention of the different benefactors.

In the hamlet of Caervallwch, about two miles westward from the village, are the remains of a very extensive camp, called Moel y Gaer, or "the fortified hill," occupying an eminence surrounded by a deep circular fosse, and having an entrance on the western side: within the area, and near the northern extremity, is a small artificial mound, from the summit of which is one of the most extensive views in the principality. This camp, which is the most perfect of all the British posts in North Wales, commanded all the lines of stations on the Clwydian mountains, to the west: the view from it embraces the Vales of Hope and Mold, as far as Wrexham on the south; the estuaries of the Dee and the Mersey, with the port of Liverpool, on the north; and Chester on the east. About three hundred paces to the north-west of it is a large artificial mound, commanding the pass of the mountain, and most probably intended as an outpost to the principal camp of Moel y Gaer. At the distance of one mile to the north of the village of Northop, and near the road leading to Holywell, are the ruins of Llŷs Edwyn, the ancient palace of Edwyn ab Gronow, the above-named Prince of Tegengl: these remains, which are very inconsiderable, occupy a commanding situation; the foundations of the palace may still be traced, and the moat by which it was surrounded is still tolerably perfect on the north-east. Edwyn, in conjunction with several of the native princes of North Wales, attempted to oppose the progress of William the Conqueror in the subjugation of the principality, but without success, and, as appears from Domesday-book, was compelled to hold his territories subject to that monarch. After Edwyn's death, in 1073, they remained in the possession of his descendants till the reign of Henry IV., when Howel Gwynedd, having embraced the cause of Owain Glyndwr, was taken prisoner and beheaded, and his estates were forfeited to the crown. Wat's Dyke, here erroneously called Offa's Dyke, enters this parish in the hamlet of Soughton, and, crossing the road to Mold, near the turnpike gate, takes a westerly course for some distance, and then forming an acute angle and taking a northern direction, crosses the Holywell road at the stone quarry, within a mile from the village of Northop, and passes near Llŷs Edwyn, where it again pursues a westerly course, and leaves the parish near Cornist. William Parry, L.L.D., who was representative in parliament for Queenborough in the reign of Elizabeth, and who was executed before the door of the parliament-house, in 1584, for designing the death of that sovereign, was a native of this parish; and Dr. John Wynne, Bishop of St. Asaph, and afterwards of Bath and Wells, who received the rudiments of his education in the grammar school of this place, was interred in the chancel of the church; he erected Soughton Hall in 1714. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £863. 11.

NORTON, a parish in the hundred and county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N.N.W.) from Presteign, containing 297 inhabitants. This parish, which is pleasantly situated in the eastern part of the county, bordering upon Herefordshire, and is intersected by the great turnpike road from North Wales to Presteign, comprises a considerable tract of arable and pasture land, of which the greater portion is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The surrounding scenery, though not distinguished by any peculiarity, is pleasing and well wooded; and the views, especially towards the east, embracing a portion of the county of Hereford, are interesting and diversified. The inhabitants of the village, which is seated on a small stream that falls into the river Lug, call this place a borough, and style themselves burgesses; but nothing satisfactory is recorded either of the time or the manner in which they obtained their privileges, which are but few and very obscurely defined: they are empowered to hold a court every two or three years, and it is said that the interval between these courts must not exceed four years. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £5, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Andrew, is an ancient edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, with a low tower. A school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children is supported by Lady Brydges: the school-room, towards the erection of which Walter Wilkins, Esq., contributed £80, is a neat and appropriate building. In the parish is the site of an ancient castle, of which no account can now be obtained. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £134. 5.

NOTTAGE, a hamlet in the parish of NEWTON-NOTTAGE, hundred of NEWCASTLE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (W. by S.) from Bridgend. The population is included in the return for the parish. It is bounded on the west by the sea; and the Dyfryn Llynvi and Porthcawl railway passes close to the village, on the east. A Sunday school has been established, and is supported by the incumbent of the parish, for the instruction of poor children. The average annual assessment for the support of the poor is £86.

O.

OVERTON, or OVERTON-MADOC, a borough and parish (anciently a market town), in the hundred of MAELOR, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (N. N. W.) from Ellesmere, containing 1746 inhabitants. This place, which is divided into two portions, called the Ville and the Foreign, derives the adjunct to its name from Madoc ab Meredydd, Prince of Powys and lord of Overton, who is said to have erected a castle here, of which the only vestige is the site, still called Castle field. At the time of the Conquest, this place, called in Domesday-book "Ovretone," was in the possession of a Saxon chieftain, but was granted by the Conqueror to Robert Fitz-Hugh, one of his followers. Edward I., in the 14th year of his reign, gave the lordship to his queen Eleanor, who granted it to Robert de Crevecoeur, with the privilege of a weekly market and a fair; and in the 20th of his reign, Edward made it a free borough by charter. The same monarch, in the following year, commanded Reginald de Grey, chief justice of Chester, to go personally to Overton, and to assign to the burgesses, and to such others as might be induced to become inhabitants, competent lands within the demesne of Overton castle, and wood to build them burgages; and in the 28th of his reign, Edward granted to the burgesses an exemption from toll for seven years, and various other immunities. Edward II. gave the borough and lordship to his queen Isabel; and in the 14th of the reign of Edward III. they were granted, together with other lands in Maelor, to Eubule le Strange, baron of Knockyn, with a confirmation of the preceding charter, which was also confirmed and enlarged, with additional privileges, in the 30th of Richard II.

The village is beautifully situated on elevated ground on the banks of the Dee, over which river is a handsome stone bridge of two lofty arches, connecting the counties of Denbigh and Flint, and on the turnpike road leading from Chester to Shrewsbury. The surrounding scenery is beautifully picturesque, being composed of a great diversity of features in pleasing combination and agreeable contrast. From a ridge near the village is seen, on one side, an extensive plain of verdant meadows, enlivened by the windings of the river Dee, skirted in front by fertile and richly wooded slopes, and bounded in the distance by the lofty summits of the surrounding mountains; on the other side the Vale Royal of Cheshire, abounding with richly diversified and highly picturesque scenery, and the fertile and open plains of Salop, in luxuriant cultivation, are seen in all their beauty. The village is pleasing and prepossessing in its appearance, and, with its venerable church, as seen from almost every point of view, forms a picturesque and highly interesting feature in the landscape. At the bridge, which is about a mile from the village, the river, after spreading through the adjacent plains, becomes contracted in its channel, and flows rapidly between its lofty and precipitous banks, which are crowned with wood. There is neither trade nor manufacture of any kind carried on; but on the banks of the Dee, between Overton and the contiguous village of Bangor-Iscoed, exists a considerable quantity of a species of ductile clay, adapted for the use of potters. The market has long been discontinued; but fairs are annually held on the Monday before Holy Thursday, June 11th, August 9th, and October 8th. Overton is one of the contributory boroughs within the county which are united in the return of one member to parliament: the right of voting is in every householders who is rated to the relief of the poor, and has paid his rates for six months previously to an election; the present number of voters is three hundred and eighteen. The limits of the borough, which are co-extensive with those of the parish, and comprise an area of nine miles in circumference, have not been altered by the Boundary Act recently passed. This has also been made one of the polling-places in the election of a knight for the shire. The borough is within the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, who hold petty sessions for the hundred at this place. A house of correction for the hundred was erected here in 1824, at the expense of the county.

The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Bangor-Iscoed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, and originally a spacious cruciform structure, consists at present only of a nave, aisles, and chancel, with a lofty square tower surmounted with an embattled circular turret, commanding a very extensive view: the prevailing character is the early style of English architecture; the tower, which appears to be of later date, is supposed to have been built when the church was reduced in dimensions by the removal of the transepts and the original tower at the intersection, which had probably fallen into decay. In the chancel there is a pew which appears to have been granted to the Kynaston family, and on which is the inscription "Protectoris Auctoritate," 1649. The north aisle has been recently enlarged, and two hundred and eighty-one additional sittings have been erected, of which one hundred and sixty-six are free, in consideration of a grant of £200 by the Incorporated Society for building and enlarging churches and chapels. The churchyard, which is spacious, is remarkable for the great number of yew trees of extraordinary growth with which it abounds. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists, erected in 1816. A National school, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children, has been built and is supported by subscription. The site of the ancient castle occupies the brow of a lofty promontory overlooking the river Dee; and in the park of Gwernhailed, in this parish, are the remains of a large circular camp, surrounded by a rampart of earth, called the castle yard: it commands the whole of the country to the west of the river, and near it is a tumulus, twenty-two yards in length and twelve yards broad, raised to a considerable height: it is called the Giant's Grave, but nothing is recorded of its origin or history. In the ancient mansion of Maesgwaelod, for several centuries the residence of the Hammer family, and from which the township took its name, now the property of Major Fletcher, who commanded the rear of the British army at the battle of Corunna, on the 16th of January, 1809, are the keys of that city, which were brought away by Major Fletcher, and deposited here; they are held together by a ring, from which is suspended a steel plate, with the legend "Portigo de Puerta de Abigo." The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £347. 6.

OXWICH, a parish in the hundred of SWANSEA, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 14 miles by Penrice, and 13 across the sands, (W. S. W.) from Swansea, containing 241 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the Bristol channel, and on the western shore of the small but fine bay to which it gives name, and which has a considerable depth of water at all times of the tide, as well as good anchorage. It comprises but a moderate tract of arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The surrounding scenery is finely varied, and enlivened with luxuriant woods, and the views over the channel and the adjacent country abound with interest. The bay on the north has some firm and smooth sands, well adapted for sea-bathing: on the east it is bounded by lofty and precipitous cliffs, affording shelter from the winds, and on the west by gently sloping hills richly covered with wood from the margin of the water to their summits. A few of the inhabitants are employed in blasting the contiguous limestone rocks, and in digging on the shore for stones of a similar quality, with which small vessels are occasionally freighted for the opposite coast of Devonshire. Lobsters and crabs, together with two or three species of edible sea plants, are procured here. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £9. 9. 2., and in the patronage of C.R.M. Talbot, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Illtyd, is romantically situated at the base of a hill on the western side of the bay, and, as seen from the sands, has a very picturesque appearance: it contains an ancient altar-tomb, on which are the effigies of a knight and his lady, in a recumbent position. Thomas Bevan, in 1708, bequeathed £10 to the poor of the parish. On the hill above the village are the ruins of Oxwich castle, supposed to have been built about the middle of the sixteenth century, by Sir Rice Mansel, rather as a residence than as a place of strength: they consist chiefly of some dilapidated portions of the walls, in one of which are the remains of a fine window. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £37. 3.

OYSTERMOUTH, a parish in the hundred of SWANSEA, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (S. W.) from Swansea, containing 1164 inhabitants. This place was anciently called by the Welsh Caer Tawy, and probably derived that name from the erection of a castle, the foundation of which is by some historians ascribed to Henry de Beaumont, who wrested from Caradoc ab Iestyn extensive territories in the province of Gower, for the security of which he built several castles; and by others to Richard de Granville, one of the Norman knights who attended Robert Fitz-Hamon, and who materially contributed to his conquest of Glamorgan. The parish is situated in the peninsula of Gower, and is bounded on the east by the bay of Swansea: it comprises a very extensive portion of arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and in good cultivation, and a large tract of common, which is unenclosed and open for pasture to the proprietors and tenants of land in the parish. The village is much resorted to by visitors during the summer; but, from its peculiar situation under a high limestone rock, which deprives it of the sun for several months in the winter, it is but a very dreary residence during that season. The surrounding scenery, though rather bold and striking, has little either of a picturesque or pleasing character; but the high grounds command noble views over the bays of Swansea and Carmarthen, the peninsula of Gower, which separates them, and the Bristol channel. Woodlands Castle, the seat of the late General Warde, is a handsome modern mansion, situated about a mile and a half to the north of Oystermouth Castle. There are some quarries of limestone of an excellent quality, which from its being susceptible of a fine polish, is substituted for marble in the manufacture of mantel-pieces, monumental tablets, and other articles: a considerable number of the poorer inhabitants find employment in these quarries, which are worked upon an extensive scale, and in the mills which have been erected for sawing and polishing the blocks of stone, which are here manufactured into the various articles above noticed. In working the quarries it has been stated that human bones of a large size have been frequently discovered. A tram-road, which has been constructed from this place to Swansea, along the sea-coast, affords facility of conveying the limestone from the quarries, and of bringing back coal and manure. The oyster fishery is carried on during the season to a considerable extent, chiefly for the supply of the Bristol market; and salmon are frequently procured from the weirs on the shores of Swansea bay. The Mumbles Point, an insulated rock at high water, forms the western extremity of Swansea bay; and the trustees of the harbour have erected a lighthouse upon it, which has been productive of the greatest benefit to vessels navigating this coast, and is supported by a small toll payable by each vessel passing within a certain distance of it. The Mumbles Roads afford excellent shelter, with good anchorage, for ships navigating the channel, which frequently put in here during the prevalence of westerly gales, to the number, occasionally, of two hundred sail.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Colonel Perrott, as impropiator of the tithes. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is a neat and appropriate edifice, not remarkable for any architectural details of importance: it contains a monument to the memory of Thomas Bowdler, Esq., of Rhydings, in this county, editor of the Family Shakespeare, and of a purified edition of Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A neat school-room was built in the churchyard, by the late Rhys Davis, Esq., who appropriated eight guineas per annum, payable out of the tithes of the parish, towards the support of the school, which sum is annually paid by the present impropiator. Mrs. Benbow bequeathed two guineas per annum to the poor of the parish. Upon the summit of a knoll, surrounded by broken cliffs, a little to the north-westward of the church, and commanding a fine marine prospect, are the remains of the ancient castle, consisting principally of the shell, which is nearly entire: the walls are finely mantled with ivy, and in such good preservation that the plan of several of the apartments may be distinctly traced; the prevailing character of the architecture is the early English style, of which it affords a very good specimen, and the ruins retain an air of venerable and stately grandeur. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £135. 18.

PAINSCASTLE (PAIN'S CASTLE), a township and small village, in the parish of LLANBEDR-PAINSCASTLE, hundred of PAINSCASTLE, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (N. W. by W.) from Hay. The population is included in the return for the parish. It is situated in a vale near the northern bank of the Bächwy stream, which nearly encircles the village, and was formerly of much greater importance than it is at present, having had a castle and a market, but the former no longer exists, and the latter has been discontinued: fairs continue to be held on May 12th, September 22nd, and December 15th, for horned cattle, sheep, and horses. Under the recent act to amend the representation, this is constituted a polling-place for the election of the knight of the shire; and the petty sessions for the hundred are sometimes held here. For an historical notice of the castle, which was once so considerable as to give name both to the village and the hundred, but of which the only vestige is the moat that surrounds the site, near the north-western extremity of the village, see the article on LLANBEDR-PAINSCASTLE.

PARCEL CANOL (PARSEL-CANOL), a township in that part of the parish of LLANBADARN-VAWR which is in the upper division of the hundred of GENEU'R GLYN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (E.) from Aberystwith, containing 497 inhabitants. It is situated to the north of the river Rheidol, and contains some pleasing and respectable residences surrounded with timber. There is an endowment of £6. 2. 6. per annum for a free school, arising from a bequest of £150 by Richard Lewis, Esq., late of Abercudmole. A new church, or chapel, is about to be erected at Tŷn' y Llidiart, in this township, towards defraying the expense of which several hundred pounds have been already raised by public subscription. The poor are maintained by a separate assessment, the average annual expenditure amounting to £99. 7.

PARK (PARC), a hamlet in the parish of EGLWYSILAN, hundred of CAERPHILLY, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 11 miles (S. S. E.) from Merthyr-Tydvil, containing 123 inhabitants. It is situated in the northern part of the parish, and on the eastern declivity of the lofty eminence called Cevn Eglwysilan.

PARTRISHOW, a parish in the hundred of CRICKHOWEL, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (N. E. by E.) from Crickhowel, containing 73 inhabitants. The present name of this parish is by some supposed to be a corruption of its original appellation, Parthau yr Ishow, signifying "the parcel or territory of Ishow," the patron saint to whom its church is dedicated. The late Archdeacon Payne conceived the original name to have been more correctly Merthyr Ishow, or "Ishow the Martyr," to whom, according to the ancient register of Llandaf, a church was consecrated here, in the eleventh century, by Bishop Herewald, under the name of "Methur Yssui." The parish is situated in a mountainous district, and is bounded on the south and east by the river Grwyne-Vawr, which separates it from the isolated hamlet of Fawyddog, in the county of Hereford, and from part of Monmouthshire; on the south and west by the parish of Llanbedr; and on the north by the hamlet of Grwyne-Vawr, in the parish of Talgarth. It is in a very retired situation, remote from any public road, and possessing no facility of intercourse with the places in its vicinity: the surrounding country presents some fine mountain scenery. The living is consolidated with the rectory of Llanbedr, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's. The church, which is in the later style of English architecture, and appears to have been rebuilt upon the site of the ancient structure consecrated by Bishop Herewald, consists of a nave and chancel only; the vaulted roof is of open timber frame-work; the font, which is of great antiquity, is very large, though formed out of a single block of stone; around the edge is the inscription "In tempore Gynillyn, Meilir me fecit." Cynhyllyn, son of Rhys Gôch, was lord of Ystradwy, now the hundred of Crickhowel, in the reign of Henry I., at the time when the ancient church was erected. The rood-loft, which is beautifully carved in Irish oak, and traditionally said to be the work of an Italian artist, is still remaining: it is evidently of the time of Henry VII., and was probably the gift of the Herbert family, who had property in the parish: at the west end of the nave is a small chapel, with the altar still remaining, and a small cinquefoiled niche, probably intended for the image of the saint. Poor girls of this parish are entitled to gratuitous instruction in the school at Llanbedr, on the foundation of Mrs. Herbert. At the bottom of the hill on which the church stands there is a stream called Nant Mair, or "Mary's brook;" and near its margin is the well of St. Ishow, open in front, but enclosed on three sides by walls, in which were recesses, most probably intended to receive the offerings presented by the votaries of the saint. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £49.2.

PATER, or PATERCHURCH, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES.—See PEMBROKE.

Corporate Seal.

PEMBROKE, a borough, market-town, and sea-port, having separate jurisdiction, locally in the hundred of Castlemartin, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (S. E. by E.) from Milford, 10 (S. by E.) from Haverfordwest, and 248 (W.) from London, containing, exclusively of the parish of Monkton, 5383 inhabitants. The name of this place is derived from the words Pen-Bro, literally signifying a headland or promontory, and originally applied to a district nearly corresponding in extent with the present hundred of Castlemartin, stretching out into the sea, and separating Milford Haven, on the north, from the Bristol channel on the south. On the erection of a castle and the consequent growth of the town, the name of the district in which they were situated was transferred to them, and subsequently to the whole of the county of which that town became the capital. The early history of this place is involved in some confusion: it is stated by Giraldus Cambrensis, that Arnulph de Montgomery erected here, in the reign of Henry I., a slender fortress of stakes and turf, which, on his return into England, he placed under the custody of his constable and lieutenant, Giraldus de Windsor. In the Chronicle of Caradoc of Llancarvan, who was contemporary with Giraldus, it is expressly stated that the castle was attacked in 1092, and again in 1094, by the forces of Cadwgan ab Bleddyn, but that it was so strongly fortified as to baffle every effort of that chieftain to reduce it. The latter of these dates, which is some years prior to the accession of Henry I., contradicts the statement of Giraldus Cambrensis, with respect to the time of the original foundation; and the result of the attacks by so formidable an enemy is at variance with his description of the character of the fortress. Arnulph de Montgomery, on the accession of Henry I., having joined in a confederacy against that sovereign, the castle of Pembroke, together with his other estates, became forfeited to the crown, and Henry afterwards conferred the castle, together with the lordship of Carew and several other manors, on Giraldus de Windsor, Arnulph's lieutenant, who had married Nêst, daughter of Rhys ab Tewdwr. According to Caradoc of Llancarvan, Giraldus or Gerald de Windsor rebuilt the castle of Pembroke in the year 1105, on a more advantageous site, called "Congarth Vechan," and removed into it his family and his goods. Soon after this, according to some authorities, Owain, son of Cadwgan ab Bleddyn, having heard the beauty of Nêst extolled at a banquet given by Cadwgan, either at his castle of Aberteivy, or at that of Eare Weare, in the parish of Amroath, came, under the pretence of relationship, to pay her a visit at this place, and becoming enamoured at this interview, resolved upon carrying her away by force. For this purpose, having obtained the aid of some young men as profligate as

himself, he returned in the evening to the castle, which he entered unobserved, and, placing a guard over the chamber of Nêst, set fire to the building, and, in the confusion and alarm which ensued, forcibly conveyed her and her children to his residence in Powys. Other writers, however, are of opinion that the castle of Carew was the scene of this outrage and abduction. The alliance of Gerald with the native princes of the country, by his marriage with Nêst, who was some time after restored to him, subsequently excited the jealousy of Henry, who used every possible means to circumscribe his authority, as far as was consistent with the safety of the English interests in this province.

Gilbert de Clare, surnamed Strongbow, was created Earl of Pembroke, by Henry I., in 1109, and thus became possessed of the royal territories in this quarter, and of the castle of Pembroke; and in 1138, the earldom was erected into a county palatine, with the privilege of jura regalia; and, under the authority of its earl, a session and a monthly county court were held within the castle. In the latter all pleas of the crown were determined, fines levied, and recoveries passed: the writs were issued in the name of the earl, who held also at this place his courts of chancery and exchequer. Strongbow enlarged the castle, which he strengthened with additional fortifications, and made it in every respect a residence suitable to the dignity of the elevated rank which he held. He also incorporated the inhabitants of the town, which had arisen under the protection of the castle, and which he surrounded with a lofty embattled wall, defended by numerous bastions, and entered by three principal gates and a postern. Under the protection and influence of its earls Pembroke became a place of great importance; and in the year 1172, Henry II. kept the festival of Easter in the castle. Jasper Tudor, Earl of Pembroke, after the defeat of the Lancastrians at the battle of Barnet, retired into the castle, in which were then residing the young Earl of Richmond and his mother; but he was soon besieged by Morgan ab Thomas, brother of the celebrated Rhys ab Thomas, a zealous partisan of the house of York, to whom he must have surrendered the fortress, had not David, another brother, who had embraced the opposite interest, come promptly to his assistance, and conveyed him, together with the Countess of Richmond and her son, to Tenby, where they embarked for France.

The suppression of the palatine jurisdiction, in the reign of Henry VIII., deprived Pembroke of its dignity as the metropolis of a regality; but during the civil war of the seventeenth century, its strength rendered it the scene of many important transactions. The castle, at the commencement of the war, was the only fortress possessed by the parliamentarians in this part of the principality, and was placed under the command of Colonel Rowland Laugharne. In 1643, Admiral Swanley arrived with the parliamentary fleet in Milford Haven, and reinforced the garrison with two hundred mariners and several small pieces of cannon, with the aid of which the governor succeeded in reducing most of the neighbouring fortresses, which were garrisoned for the king. In 1647, Colonel Laugharne, and likewise Colonels Powell and Poyer, abandoning the interest of the parliament, and embracing that of the opposite party, made Pembroke their head-quarters, and the rallying point for the army which they raised on behalf of the king; and after their defeat in the disastrous battle of St. Fagan's, in Glamorganshire, retired hither with the remnant of their forces, closely followed by the parliamentarian army, led by Cromwell in person, who immediately commenced the siege of the town, taking post at Welsdon, a village about two miles and a half from it. The siege was conducted with the greatest vigour, and sustained with obstinate valour by the garrison, who were resolved to hold out to the last extremity; but Cromwell having found means to destroy their mills, and their supply of water being also cut off by the destruction of a staircase leading into a cavern under one of the towers, in which was their chief reservoir, there remained only the alternative of a lingering death or immediate submission. Under these circumstances the garrison capitulated, on condition that their chief leaders should throw themselves on the mercy of the parliament; that several of the inferior officers should leave the kingdom, not to return within two years; that all arms and ammunition should be given up, and that the town should be spared from plunder. Laugharne, Powell, and Poyer were afterwards tried by a court martial, and being found guilty of treason, were condemned to be shot; but the authorities being induced to spare two of them, it was ordered that they should draw lots for this favour; and accordingly three papers were folded up, on two of which was written "Life given by God," and the third left blank: the latter was drawn by Colonel Poyer, who was shot in Covent Garden, on the 25th of April, 1649. That the surrender of the garrison was justly attributed to the failure of their supply of water, by the accident above noticed, has been confirmed by a recent discovery of the cavern, in which was found a copious spring of water, with the shattered remains of a staircase leading to it from the tower, the bones of a man, and several cannon balls.

The importance of this place subsequently to the abolition of the palatinate depending principally upon its castle, which, after these events, was never re-fortified, it now experienced a further decline, owing to its remote situation and want of commerce; and though it has to the present day nominally retained its dignity as the capital of the county, it dwindled into comparative insignificance, as all the substantial benefits arising from that distinction were transferred to Haverfordwest, which, from its more central situation, was found better adapted for the transaction of the business of the county. The removal of the government dock-yard from Milford to this place, in 1814, however, materially contributed to revive its prosperity; and since that period it has been gradually increasing in extent and population, and, from the many local advantages which it possesses for an establishment of this nature, there is every prospect of its becoming in due time one of the most considerable naval arsenals in the kingdom. The town is beautifully situated on an elevated ridge projecting into the head of the Pennar Mouth Pill, forming the largest southern creek of Milford Haven, and which it divides into two branches, by which, at high water, it is nearly insulated, and over each of which is a neat bridge of stone: it consists principally of one long street, irregularly built, and connected on the west with the ancient village of Monkton, which forms a suburb to the town, and on the north with a new street leading to Pembroke Dock, a flourishing and populous place, about two miles to the north-west, forming a distinct town within the parish of St. Mary, which has arisen since the removal of the dock-yard thither from Milford. The houses are built on both sides of the ridge, of which the western extremity is crowned with the magnificent ruins of the ancient castle, and on both sides are gardens sloping down from the houses to the water's edge: the embattled walls with which the ancient town was surrounded are still tolerably perfect on the north side, and the entire town, rising above the waters of the broad inlet, amidst some of the richest scenery in this part of the principality, has an air of venerable grandeur and picturesque beauty. The streets are partially paved and lighted, and the inhabitants are amply supplied with excellent water from seven public conduits in different parts of the town, to which it is conveyed from a distance of half a mile, by means of pipes laid down at the expense of the corporation. There are no particular manufactures carried on, the inhabitants consisting of persons of small independent fortune, shopkeepers, publicans, and a few whose business is at the dock; but it serves in a great measure as a dépôt for the neighbouring districts. Stone coal is brought from a distance of about six miles to the east of it, and bituminous coal from Swansea, Llanelly, Newport, and other places on the southern coast. When colonial produce was not permitted to be imported into Ireland direct, it was lodged in warehouses appropriated to that purpose at Pembroke ferry, in the parish of St. Mary, but that place is at present of no commercial importance. The market, which is abundantly supplied with provisions of every kind, is on Saturday; and there are fairs on April 12th, Trinity Monday, July 10th, October 10th, and November 30th; and in the suburb of Monkton, on May 4th and September 25th. The two parishes of St. Mary and St. Michael comprise, in addition to the towns of Pembroke and Pembroke Dock, a considerable adjacent agricultural district.

PEMBROKE DOCK, sometimes likewise called PATER, or PATERCHURCH, is situated on the southern shore of Milford Haven, about two miles from the old town. It consists of several streets of neat and well-built houses, and is partially paved, but not lighted; there are numerous good shops for the supply of the population, several of which are branches from the larger establishments in the borough. A handsome enclosed market-place was erected here about five years ago; but it has hitherto been but scantily supplied, and most of the inhabitants frequent the market at Pembroke. The dock-yard forms a spacious area enclosed within a lofty wall of stone, and comprises a neat range of buildings for the public offices, houses for the principal officers of the establishment, a well-built chapel fitted up with elegant simplicity for the use of the officers and men employed in the yard, and a fort, which is just completed, for the defence of the place, mounting twenty-three long twenty-four pounders. There are twelve slips for ship-building, which is at present the only business carried on in the yard, though, from the low price of labour in this part of the country, and the facility of obtaining materials of all kinds, it is in con-

temptation to introduce other branches of labour for the naval service. There are at present on the stocks, and in different states of progress, the Royal William of one hundred and twenty guns; the Rodney, of ninety-two guns; the Forth, of forty-six guns; the Andromache, of twenty-eight; the Harrier, of eighteen; and the Cockatrice schooner: the number of men employed at present is about five hundred. Besides the government establishment there is a small private dock, and it is probable that the Irish packet establishment will be removed from Milford to this place, with a view to which alteration a very fine jetty is now being constructed at Hobb's Point, a few hundred yards to the east of the dock-yard, from which new roads have been formed, connecting it with the main road from Carmarthen, in a new line avoiding both Narberth and Haverfordwest, by which route the mail will save a distance of several miles. About a mile to the east of the dock-yard is Pembroke ferry, belonging to the crown, and held by Sir John Owen, Bart., who underlets it at an annual rent of £200: it forms the shortest and most usual line of communication between Haverfordwest and Pembroke, the distance between which places by the ferry is only ten miles, but by Narberth twenty-five: the fares are one-halfpenny for a foot passenger, one penny for a man and horse, and one shilling per wheel for carriages. The entrance from Milford Haven to the creek at the head of which the town of Pembroke is situated, at low water, is little more than a hundred yards wide, and from nine to twelve feet deep; but proceeding upwards it immediately expands into a wide oozy reach, called Crow Pool, containing an abundance of excellent oysters.

The inhabitants of Pembroke received their first charter of incorporation from Gilbert Strongbow, Earl of Pembroke, in the reign of Stephen; but the earliest of which any record is preserved they obtained in the reign of John: various others have been granted to them by succeeding sovereigns, the latest being that of King James II. The corporation consists of a mayor and an indefinite number of common-councilmen (of whom all who have passed the chair are styled aldermen), assisted by a town-clerk, two serjeants at mace, and other officers. The mayor is chosen annually from the common-councilmen, who elect the members of their own body and two bailiffs from the burgesses at large, who are likewise chosen by the common council. Pembroke, with the contributory boroughs of Tenby, Wiston, and Milford, which last was added by the act recently passed for amending the representation of the people, sends one member to parliament: the right of election has hitherto been vested in the mayor, bailiffs, and burgesses, but is now, by the late act, confined to such of these as are resident, and extended to every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act directs: the number of tenements of this value, within the limits of the borough, which are minutely detailed in the Appendix, is two hundred and ninety-seven, including those in the parish of Monkton, which for electoral purposes has been included within the borough: the mayor is the returning officer. The mayor, who is also coroner and clerk of the market, is a justice of the peace within the old borough, his jurisdiction extending over the parishes of St. Mary and St. Michael, and likewise, as regards the duties of coroner, into the village of Monkton, in the parish of St. Nicholas. A mayor's court is held pro forma every fortnight, but all other courts formerly held have fallen into disuse. The revenue of the corporation amounts to about £100, arising out of the tolls of the markets and fairs. Pembroke has been constituted a polling-place in the election of a knight for the shire. The town-hall is a plain modern building in the centre of the south side of the principal street, and underneath it is a commodious area for the corn market.

The livings of all the three parishes of St. Mary, St. Michael, and St. Nicholas, are consolidated into one discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £9, (viz., £4 for St. Michael's, and £5 for that of Monkton, or St. Nicholas, St. Mary's not being in charge,) and in the gift of Sir John Owen, Bart. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is an ancient and venerable structure, in the Norman style of architecture, situated near the centre of the town, and composed of a nave, chancel, and north aisle, with a small chapel on the southern side: in the north aisle and in the chancel are doorways, now closed up, which formerly communicated with additional buildings no longer standing. That dedicated to St. Michael has been nearly rebuilt from the ground, in the later style of English architecture, the expense having been defrayed by a parochial rate. Each of these churches had anciently chapels of ease, situated a little distance without the walls of the town; and on the summit of an eminence, about three-quarters of a mile to the south of the town, still stands an ancient ecclesiastical edifice, dedicated to St. Daniel, with a lofty spire rising from a low tower, now private property. The chapel within the dock-yard is not consecrated, and is in the patronage of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A grammar school was founded here, in 1690; but its endowment does not exceed £10 per annum. A National school for the united parishes (including therefore the village of Monkton), in which two hundred children of both sexes receive gratuitous instruction, is supported by subscription: the school is held in a house in the town, hired for the purpose, which is also appropriated to the use of a savings-bank. Dr. I. Jones, of Carmarthen, in 1698, bequeathed his estates, real and personal, to be appropriated to the apprenticing of poor children and the relief of the poor of the four parishes of Lawrenny, St. David's, Cosheston, and Lampeter-Velvrey, with a discretionary power to his brother, the Rev. William Jones, to add such other parishes as he should think proper to the four named by the testator; and Mr. W. Jones accordingly, by deed in 1703, vested in three trustees the several sums of £300, £100, and £44, to be laid out in the purchase of land, and the rents to be appropriated to the apprenticing of poor children and the relief of the poor of this place, to which purposes the income, now £143. 13., is applied. Matthew Warren bequeathed a rent-charge of £2. 12., and George Evans another of fourteen shillings, for bread to twelve poor widows; Richard Howell bequeathed £100; Margaret Mears £30, of which £10 has been lost; Sir Hugh Owen, Bart., £20; and Sir Martin Beckman £5, for the poor: there are also some other charitable donations and bequests.

The majestic and venerable remains of the ancient castle occupy the western extremity of the elevated ridge on which the town is built, and are justly regarded as among the most picturesque and magnificent ruins in the country. The entire fortress was surrounded by a lofty embattled wall, defended by numerous bastions, and having only one entrance from the land, through a grand gateway defended by two circular towers of prodigious strength, and a barbican. On this side it had likewise a dry moat, and the enclosed area was divided into an inner and an outer ward, the former of which comprised the state apartments, and the latter the inferior buildings and the offices for the use of the garrison. The principal remains consist of this grand entrance, the state apartments occupying the northern side, and the keep, which latter is in the inner court, a massive and lofty round tower, seventy-five feet high, and one hundred and sixty-three feet in circumference at the base, and gradually diminishing in diameter towards the top, which is covered with a vaulted roof. This tower is divided into five stages, and the walls are seventeen feet in thickness at the base, and fourteen feet thick at the summit, from which is obtained a most extensive and delightful prospect, comprehending the greater part of Pembrokeshire, from the Pencilly mountains, on the north, to the sea, and from the Carmarthenshire hills, on the east, to St. George's channel, presenting a fine open champaign country, intersected by the numerous æstuaries which unite to form the noble haven of Milford, and richly diversified and enlivened with cheerful villages and gentlemen's seats, among which those of Cresselly, Clareston, Orieltion, and others, the grounds of which are richly wooded, form a striking and beautiful contrast to the general appearance of the surrounding country, which is elsewhere almost destitute of timber. In the inner court, besides the keep, is a suite of apartments apparently of later date than the rest of the castle, extending over the cavern called the Wogan, or Hogan, by corruption of the Welsh word Ogov, signifying "a cave:" this subterraneous chamber is seventy-five feet in length and fifty-nine feet wide, and communicates with the upper part of the castle by a staircase, and with the harbour below by a sally-port. The rock on which the castle is built is forty feet high, and is almost insulated by the two branches of the æstuary into which it projects, and which is navigable to the town: under the south-eastern bastion there is a natural opening in it, of unknown extent. The great solidity of the walls, and its commanding situation, must have rendered this fortress impregnable against any hostile attempt; and its ponderous towers, with the northern suite of state apartments rising above the embattled walls, and part of the platform and parapet, which are still remaining, give its present ruins an air of venerable grandeur; and the ivy and other parasitical plants with which they are overspread contribute to heighten the picturesque beauty of their appearance. Leland says he was shown an apartment in one of the gateway towers, in which he was informed Henry VII. was born; but other writers refer that circumstance to a room in the inner court of the castle. Pembroke castle is now the property of the crown, and is held, under lease granted in the reign of James II., by Pryse Pryse, of Gogerthan, Esq. This place gives the title of earl to the noble family of Herbert. The different parishes of Pembroke, though ecclesiastically united, continue separate for all civil purposes; the average annual expenditure for the support of the poor in the two forming the ancient borough amounts to £1284. 11., of which sum, £854. 2. is assessed on the parish of St. Mary, and £430. 9. on that of St. Michael.

PEMBROKESHIRE, a maritime county of SOUTH WALES, bounded on the north-east by the south-western extremity of Cardiganshire, from which it is separated by the navigable river Teivy; on the east by Carmarthenshire, on the south-east by Carmarthen bay, on the south by the Bristol channel, and on the west and north-west by St. George's channel: on the latter side its coast forms part of the southern boundary of the great bay of Cardigan, while directly westward it is deeply indented by the broad expanse of St. Bride's bay. It extends from 51° 33' to 52° 4' (N. Lat.), and from 4° 45' to 5° 37' (W. Lon.); and comprises an area, according to Mr. Carey's Communications to the Board of Agriculture, of three hundred and forty-five thousand six hundred statute acres, or nearly five hundred and thirty-two square miles. The population, in 1831, was 81,424.

At the period of the conquest of Britain by the Romans, this county formed part of the territory of a tribe called by these conquerors Dimetæ, who also occupied the present counties of Cardigan and Carmarthen, and whose country has been called after their name Dimetia. The ancient British name of this province was Dyved, from which word Mr. Llwyd thinks it probable that the Roman Dimetæ was derived. The British name may be considered as an abbreviation of Deheuvod, or Deduvod, "the southern country, or the country on the right;" as Deheubarth is the common Welsh designation of South Wales. In process of time, however, the limits of the territory to which the name Dyved was especially applied seem to have been contracted until they became nearly identical with those of the present county of Pembroke, which, by Welsh writers, is still frequently called by its ancient British name. The etymology of its present name of Pembrokeshire does not appear ever to have been satisfactorily ascertained; but it seems that, in the time of Giraldus Cambrensis, the small peninsula of Castlemartin, lying between Milford Haven, on the north, and the Bristol channel on the south, constituted the province of Pembrock, a name also applied to the town and fortress built there by Arnulph de Montgomery, in the reign of Henry I., and thence afterwards given to the whole county: the British words pen and bro, from which this name has been supposed to be derived, signify the promontory, or headland region, and are correctly descriptive of the territory to which the name was originally applied. Under the Roman dominion Pembrokeshire contained the station Ad Vigesium, near its eastern confines; and that of Menapia, in the vicinity of St. David's. It was traversed from east to west by the great Via Julia, which entered it from the station Maridunum, at Carmarthen, and passed by that of Ad Vigesium to Menapia; while another road, vulgarly called in later times "the Flemings' Way," connected the latter station with that of Loventium, at Llanio in Cardiganshire, passing for a great distance over the Preselè mountains into the northern parts of Carmarthenshire. Little is known concerning this territory for a long period after the withdrawal of the Roman forces from Britain, though it appears, in common with most other parts of the country, to have passed under the dominion of several lines of lords, or princes, some of whom are occasionally called, in the Welsh annals, kings of Dyved; but it seems doubtful whether the whole country was ever subject to the authority of a single chieftain, until a kind of nominal authority was claimed over it by the princes of Dynevor, and occasionally by those of North Wales. Of the pedigrees preserved by the Welsh heralds of the succession of the lords of Dyved, one only is worthy of remark, viz., that of the family of Morien Glâs, which was the most illustrious line of these princes: the exact period at which Morien Glâs flourished is not precisely ascertained, but he is supposed to have been a descendant of the great Caradoc, or Caractacus. In the year 892, during the quarrels among the three sons of Rhodri Mawr, King of all Wales, which ensued upon the death of this monarch, Anarawd, Prince of North Wales, advanced through Cardiganshire with a powerful force augmented by some English auxiliaries, and made great devastation in this county, burning the houses and destroying the corn. After the death of Hywel Dda, Ievav and Iago, Princes of North Wales, asserted their right to the dominion of all Wales, and entered the territories of the sons of Hywel, in South Wales, whom they defeated in a great battle, and then proceeded into Pembrokeshire, making dreadful ravages along the whole line of their march. This incursion was made in 949; and the year following, encouraged by their former success, the princes of North Wales marched a second time into Pembrokeshire; but on that occasion they were opposed with great spirit by Owain ab Hywel Dda, who compelled them to retreat so precipitately, that many of their forces were drowned in the river Teivy. In 987, the coasts of this county were invaded by the Danes, who made great ravages on different parts of them, burning the churches of St. David's and St. Dogmael's, the latter near Cardigan. Such was the destruction of corn and cattle made by these barbarians, that it caused a general famine, which proved fatal to many of the inhabitants. Meredydd, the reigning prince of South Wales, was compelled to purchase the retirement of these invaders by the payment of a considerable tribute. Shortly after, Edwin, son of Eineon, considering himself wrongfully dispossessed of the sovereignty of South Wales by his uncle Meredydd, raised an army and obtained considerable succours from the Saxons and Danes, with which he marched without opposition through this county, entering it from Cardiganshire, and quitting it for the southernmost parts of Carmarthenshire.

In the year 1021, Hywel and Meredydd, sons of Edwin, accompanied by Eulaff, or Aulaff, and a large army of Irish and Scots, landed in this county, with the view of obtaining for themselves the principality of South Wales from Llewelyn, who then ruled over all Wales; and, after pillaging the church of St. David's, marched eastward to Carmarthen, where they were totally defeated by Llewelyn, who, however, was slain in the action. Gruffydd, Prince of all Wales, towards the middle of the eleventh century, ravaged the lands of some of his vassals in Dyved, to punish them for having assisted Caradoc, son of Rhydderch, a prince of Glamorgan, in his endeavours to obtain the sovereignty of South Wales. During the short reign of Caradoc, who possessed himself of the dominion of South Wales soon after the conquest of England by the Normans, a party of whom he brought to his assistance against the reigning Prince Meredydd, a hostile Norman force made a descent upon the western coasts of his dominions, and ravaged a great part of this county, as well as that of Cardigan: Caradoc marched against them with great celerity, and compelled them to abandon their plunder and retreat to their ships. Two years afterwards, in 1071, they made a like predatory visit, but with no better success, being defeated with great loss by Caradoc's son and successor Rhydderch. Rhys ab Tewdwr, having, in 1077, recovered the sovereignty of South Wales almost without opposition, was soon called upon to assist another prince, who like himself, had been unjustly deprived of his lawful inheritance: this was Gruffydd ab Cynan, who laid claim to the principality of North Wales, and landed in Pembrokeshire, in the year 1080, with a large force composed of Irish-Scots: being joined by Rhys, their combined armies marched into North Wales, where they fought the celebrated battle on the hills of Carno, in Montgomeryshire, which established Gruffydd in the sovereignty of that country. About this time also, William the Conqueror entered South Wales with a powerful army, and received the homage of the Welsh princes, from whom experiencing no resistance, he changed the character of his visit, and went with his troops on a pilgrimage to the city of St. David's, at the westernmost extremity of this county, where he offered up his devotions at the shrine of the patron saint of the Cambrians. Cadivor Vawr, or Cadivor the Great, lord of Dyved, called also, from the place of his residence, lord of Blaencych, and the twenty-first in descent from Morien Glâs, died in 1088, leaving five sons by his wife, the daughter and heiress of Llywarch Llawen Vawr, another chieftain of the country included within the limits of the present county of Pembrokeshire. Two years after this event, his eldest sons, Llewelyn and Eineon, with their uncle Eineon ab Collwyn and Gruffydd ab Meredydd, another chieftain of Dyved, joined in rebellion against Rhys ab Tewdwr, Prince of South Wales, and, having united their forces, marched towards Llandydoch, now St. Dogmael's, on the Pembrokeshire side of the river Teivy, near Cardigan, where Rhys at that time resided, expecting probably to take him by surprise. In this, however, they were disappointed: Rhys immediately gave them battle near that place, and completely defeated them. Both the above-named sons of Cadivor were slain in the conflict, and Gruffydd was taken prisoner and immediately put to death as a traitor, while Eineon ab Collwyn, the sole surviving leader, fled into Glamorgan, where he acted so prominent a part in the fatal measure of introducing the Normans into that province. Bledri, the next son, having taken no part in the insurrection, was allowed to remain in quiet possession of the lordship of Cilsant, and from him was descended its late proprietor, Lord Milford. The next attempt of the Norman conquerors on the coasts of this territory proved more successful than the two preceding ones, and was made by Martin de Tours, a Norman knight, whose services under the Conqueror had been rewarded by a grant of lands on the coast of Devonshire, adjacent to the Bristol channel. He fitted out an expedition to act against such parts of Wales as he should find least prepared for defence, and having rounded the western parts of Pembrokeshire, he finally resolved on landing his troops at Fishguard, which he effected with little difficulty, and made an easy conquest of the adjacent lordship of Cemmaes, or Kemmes, in which his son Sir William erected the castle of Newport, and made it his principal residence. This conquest took place during the minority of Gruffydd, son of the late prince of South Wales, to whom the district lawfully belonged; and the possession of it was subsequently secured to the family of its new master by the marriage of Martin's son William with the daughter of Rhys ab Gruffydd, usually called the Lord Rhys.

This enterprise was undoubtedly undertaken on the general understanding that the English monarch would sanction any attack on the Welsh; and the next invasion of the territory now forming the county of Pembrokeshire was under the direct sanction of William Rufus, to whom, in 1092, Arnulph, the younger son of Roger de Montgomery, Earl of Shrewsbury, did homage by anticipation for the province of Dyved, which he was licensed to subdue whenever and by whatever means he chose, and obtained almost immediate possession of the district around the present town of Pembrokeshire, where he constructed the castle of Pembrokeshire for the defence of his newly acquired territories against the attacks of the native chieftains. That fortress proved of sufficient strength to resist the assaults of a formidable force brought against it, in the course of the same year, by Cadwgan ab Bleddyn, who again assailed it two years afterwards, but with the like ill success. Arnulph appointed Gerald de Windsor governor of this castle, but how far his actual conquests extended is uncertain; and neither he nor his immediate successors appear to have held them with such ample powers as were exercised by the lords marcher; for the king's writs issuing out of the courts at Westminster were current in the conquered territory of Pembrokeshire. On the accession of Henry I., Arnulph joined in a rebellion against that monarch, which led to his voluntary exile and the forfeiture of his estates. Henry, on this occasion, gave the government of Pembrokeshire to a Norman knight, named Saer, but soon restored it to Gerald de Windsor, who had married Henry's late concubine, Nêst, daughter of Rhys ab Tewdwr: Gerald rebuilt the castle of Pembrokeshire, in the year 1105. Cadwgan ab Bleddyn, the principal chieftain in South Wales, after the death of Rhys ab Tewdwr, contrived to continue at peace with Henry I. of England for some time after the accession of the latter, and in this interval of repose gave a splendid festival at his castle of Eare Weare, in the parish of Amroath, in this county, or, as some have asserted, but with less probability, at that of Aberteivy or Cardigan, to the principal persons of the surrounding country. At this entertainment Owain, son of Cadwgan, who had his residence in Powys, hearing the beauty of Gerald de Windsor's wife praised in the highest terms, his curiosity was greatly excited to see her, and, to gratify this wish, he took an early opportunity, on pretence of relationship, of paying her a visit. Struck with her charms at this interview, he instantly determined to make himself master of her person; and, having engaged in his service some young men upon whom he could rely, he returned the same evening either to Pembrokeshire or to Carew, it being somewhat uncertain whether this violent outrage occurred at the former or the latter place. He entered the castle unobserved, stationed a guard over the chamber in which Gerald and his wife lay, and set fire to the building. Gerald, in the confusion and alarm which ensued, would have rushed out among the incendiaries; but Nêst, suspecting some treachery, prevailed upon him to make his escape in another direction. Owain and his followers broke open the chamber door, seized Gerald's wife and his four children, and, leaving the castle in flames, and ravaging the adjacent country, carried off Nêst and the children into Powys: the latter, however, were soon restored; but this unprincipled outrage, in violation of the peace with the English, brought great evils upon the offender's family. About the year 1113, Gruffydd ab Rhys, the eldest surviving son of Rhys ab Tewdwr, who, during his minority, had resided in Ireland, came to South Wales, and was encouraged by Gerald de Windsor, who was his brother-in-law, to assert his claim to the principality; but, fearing the power of the English monarch, he retired into North Wales, whence, however, he returned soon after, and commenced a desultory warfare against the English in the south of Carmarthenshire, which he sometimes extended into this county. King Henry, regarding the conduct of his lieutenant on this occasion with extreme suspicion, circumscribed his power in every way consistent with the safety of his possessions here.

One of the most remarkable features in the whole history of Pembrokeshire is the settlement, about this period, of a numerous colony of Flemings among its native population, the memorials of which, however, are very scanty. It appears that, about the year 1106, during a tremendous storm on the coast of Flanders, the sand hills and embankments were in many places carried away, and the sea inundated a large tract of country. This calamity occasioned a great body of the inhabitants to seek an asylum in England, where they were well received by Henry I., and dispersed themselves in different counties, where, however, they soon became odious to the native population, and Henry at last removed them to the district of Roos, in this county, to the westward of the town of Haverfordwest, where at the same time a strong castle was erected, as also at Tenby. How long they remained here is not known, but it is stated by Caradoc of Llan-carvan that after a few years they disappeared; and, according to the same historian, a second inundation, in the year 1113, drove another body into England, and Henry, having urgent occasion for men to oppose the rising power of Gruffydd ab Rhys, in South Wales, sent this colony also into Pembrokeshire, assigning to them the district which had before been given to their countrymen, and ordering his commanders there to provide them with habitations and the means of subsistence, on condition that they should consider themselves as his subjects, and act under his officers in their wars against the Welsh. Henry is also said, by the Welsh historians, to have placed among them some English settlers, to teach them the English language, and habituate them to English customs. The posterity of these settlers remain to this day in the southern parts of the county, where they are plainly distinguishable from the ancient British population by their language, manners, and customs. The death of Henry I., in the year 1135, diffused a spirit of revolt and hostility throughout the whole native population of Wales, which he had kept in strict submission. The insurrection began within the present county of Pembroke, where a considerable body of Normans was defeated and destroyed. Animated by this success, the insurgents spread themselves over and ravaged this whole territory, putting to death great numbers of the foreigners. To repress this and subsequent formidable insurrections and invasions, the united forces of the Normans, Flemings, and English, in the south-western parts of Wales, were directed by several powerful leaders, amongst whom were the two sons of Gerald de Windsor; Robert Fitz-Martin, descended from the first invader of the county; William Fitz-John; and Stephen, the governor of Cardigan. But they were defeated in the vicinity of Cardigan, with the loss of three thousand men, besides great numbers who were made prisoners, or drowned in the Teivy, the few that remained taking refuge in their castles. In the year 1137, Owain, surnamed Gwynedd, Prince of North Wales, invaded this territory and compelled its inhabitants to pay him tribute. The parts of Pembrokeshire held by the Anglo-Normans at this period were regarded as the property of the crown, the commanders for the time being acting only by a delegated authority as lieutenants; but early in the reign of Stephen, in 1138, Gilbert de Clare, surnamed Strongbow, who had been created Earl of Pembroke by Henry I., in 1109, and, before the late reverses, had made himself master of the greater part of the present county of Cardigan, was invested with all the powers of a count palatine over the country from which he derived his title. This nobleman long made great but fruitless endeavours to reconquer the territories of which he had been deprived by the Welsh in Cardigan and elsewhere. In 1145, the castle of Gwys, in this county, was besieged and taken by the sons of Gruffydd ab Rhys, aided by Hywel, a natural son of Owain Gwynedd. In 1150, Cadell, brother of Rhys ab Gruffydd, Prince of South Wales, while on a hunting expedition in the territory of Pembroke, was waylaid and attacked by a party of English from Tenby: his attendants, being unarmed, were immediately dispersed, but, though left alone, he faced his assailants with great bravery, and is said to have killed several of them, at the same time receiving a severe wound, which for a long time after disabled him from active service. His brothers Rhys and Meredydd, in revenge for this outrage, marched their forces against Tenby, which place they surprised, took the castle by escalade, and slaughtered the garrison.

One of the first acts of the government of Henry II. was to banish out of England the Flemish mercenary soldiers who had followed the fortunes of Stephen; to whom, however, with great political wisdom, he granted leave to settle among their fellow-countrymen in the province of Pembroke, of which permission great numbers availed themselves, thus bringing to that colony a considerable accession of strength. Early in this reign also, Gilbert Strongbow at length succeeded in recovering much of his territories in Cardiganshire. But Rhys ab Gruffydd, Prince of South Wales, enraged against the English by repeated injuries, became their most violent enemy, and in this county made many inroads on the estates of the Flemings, ravaged their country, and then returned to his castle of Dynevor, the ancient royal seat of his ancestors. The same chieftain repeated his incursions a few years afterwards with the like success, taking and destroying the castle of Kilgerran, a place of great strength and importance. About the year 1186, Maelgwyn, son of Rhys ab Gruffydd, with an overwhelming force, took Tenby castle, and demolished the works. Gilbert Strongbow had in the mean time been succeeded in the palatinate of Pembroke by his son Richard, who died in 1176, leaving issue only one daughter, Isabel, who was in her infancy at the time of his decease, and remained a ward of the crown for fourteen years. Richard I., on his accession, gave this lady in marriage to William de la Grace, surnamed Le Mareschal, in whose family the earldom of Pembroke thus became vested, and who obtained from Richard's successor, John, the castle of Haverfordwest, and the custody of those of Carmarthen, Cardigan, and Gower. In 1199, Gruffydd, son of Rhys, the last prince of South Wales, took the important fortress of Kilgerran from his brother and enemy Maelgwyn; but a few years afterwards it fell into the hands of the Earl of Pembroke. After the death of Gruffydd, his son Rhys having been reconciled to his uncle Maelgwyn, these leaders united their forces, and, entering Pembrokeshire, overran and subdued the greater part of it. About the year 1215, Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, Prince of North Wales, led a large army into South Wales, against the territories of the English vassals, took the castles of Kemmes and Newport, in the present county of Pembroke, and closed the campaign by the reduction of those of Kilgerran and Cardigan. In settling the division of the reconquered territory, Llewelyn assigned to Maelgwyn four cantreys in Dyved, viz., Gwarthav, Penllwynoc, Kemmes, and Emlyn, with the castle of Kilgerran. In 1217, continuing his march from Brecknockshire, whither he had gone to chastise the defection of his son-in-law, Reginald de Breos, Llewelyn entered the territory of Pembroke with his army, to attack the Flemish settlers. They sent him proposals for peace, which he received at a place called Cevn Cynwarchan, but which he refused to accede to; and a part of his army crossed the river Cleddy to commence hostilities. The bishop of St. David's, attended by his clergy, then repaired to the prince on the like mission; and the prelate's intercession at length prevailed, and a peace was concluded, the principal conditions of which were, that the inhabitants of the districts of Rhôs, or Roose, and Pembroke should be subject to the prince of North Wales, and hold their lands of him as their liege lord; should pay him one thousand marks towards defraying the expenses of the war; and should deliver to him twenty hostages of the first note in their country, as a pledge of their future fidelity. William Marshal, or le Mareschal, Earl of Pembroke, who, during the lifetime of King John, of England, had constantly adhered to his interests, and, on the death of that monarch, espoused the cause of the young prince Henry, in opposition to the pretensions of the Dauphin of France, died in 1219, and was succeeded in his titles and honours by his eldest son William. In 1220, the Flemings threw off their allegiance to Llewelyn, and, marching northward, seized the castle of Cardigan, which the Welsh prince soon after recovered and razed to the ground; then, advancing into this county, he destroyed the castle and fired the town of Gwys, now Wiston, and extended his ravages to the country bordering on Milford Haven, and to the gates of the castle of Haverfordwest. During the absence of William Earl of Pembroke, in Ireland, where he had a command in the English army, Llewelyn, Prince of North Wales, laid waste his territories in this county, and took and garrisoned two of his castles. The earl, hearing of these ravages, landed from Ireland with a strong body of forces near the city of St. David's, recovered the castles of Carmarthen and Cardigan, and retaliated on their garrisons the slaughter which Llewelyn had inflicted on his own: he soon after rebuilt the strong castle of Kilgerran. Earl William died in 1231, and was succeeded in the palatinate by his next brother Richard, at that time abroad, and whom the king, on pretence that he had leagued with his enemies in France, refused to admit to the honours of his family; upon which he retired into Ireland, where, having raised a powerful band of adherents, he returned to Pembrokeshire, and took forcible possession of the Welsh territories. He then became reconciled to the king, with whom, however, he quarrelled again in 1233, concerning his Poictevin favourites, and, withdrawing to South Wales, made common cause with some of the Welsh chieftains against Henry's more devoted vassals. He was soon compelled once more to seek refuge in Ireland, where he was treacherously slain in 1234. He was succeeded in the earldom by his brother Gilbert, who obtained from the crown a grant of the towns and castles of Cardigan and Carmarthen, which had been seized from his predecessor into the hands of the king. Being accidentally killed in the year 1241, and leaving no issue, the family honours and possessions devolved upon the next brother, Walter, who in his turn died without issue, in 1246, and was succeeded by his only remaining brother, Anselme, who died a few days after, also without issue. The remarkable circumstance of the decease of all these five adult sons of William le Mareschal without issue was attributed, by the monkish historians of the time, to the impiety of their father, who had seized two manors in Ireland belonging to the bishop of Ferns, and whom that prelate had consequently excommunicated.

On the death of Anselme, the family inheritance passed to his eldest sister Maud, who had married, first, Hugh Bigod, Earl of Norfolk, and afterwards John de Warren, Earl of Surrey, and who bestowed, with the king's consent, the office of marshal, forming part of this inheritance, on her son by her first husband, Roger Bigod, Earl of Norfolk. Maud died in 1248, when the estates of the earldom of Pembroke, by marriage with her next sister Joan, devolved on Warren de Mountchensi, who died in 1255, leaving issue by this marriage a son, William, and a daughter, Joan. William succeeded his father in the earldom of Pembroke, but was killed at the siege of Dryslwyn castle, in 1289: his sister married William de Valence, half-brother to Henry III., who was created Earl of Pembroke by that sovereign, and succeeded to the palatinate. After the complete subjugation of Wales by Edward I., the attempt of that monarch to tax his newly-acquired subjects caused numerous insurrections; and the rebels of Cardiganshire, headed by Maelgwyn Vychan, overran and plundered this county. William de Valence was succeeded in the earldom of Pembroke by his son Aymer, who was murdered in 1323, while attending Queen Isabella to France; and, leaving no issue, his honours and estates passed to Lawrence Hastings, grandson of his sister Isabel, who had married John Hastings. Lawrence died in 1347 or 1349, leaving only an infant son, named John; and the custody of the castle of Pembroke, with its dependent territory, was granted, during his minority, to his mother Agnes, and afterwards to her jointly with her second husband, John de Hakeluyt. John Hastings was succeeded on his death by his son John, during whose minority the palatinate of Pembroke was given in charge to his relation, William de Beauchamp. John was accidentally killed in a tournament at Woodstock, in 1390, when only seventeen years of age; whereupon the family honours were claimed by Reginald, Lord Grey of Ruthin, who considered himself the next heir, as lineally descended from Elizabeth, the sister of John Hastings, the great-great-grandfather of the late earl. Richard II., however, retained the earldom in his own hands for nearly eight years, and then conferred it on his queen Isabella, when the government of it was committed to Thomas Percy, Earl of Worcester. On the deposition of this monarch, his successor, Henry IV., seized the earldom of Pembroke, and granted it to his son John, Duke of Bedford, who dying without issue, it passed to his brother, Humphrey Duke of Gloucester. During the spirited revolt of the Welsh under Owain Glyndwr, the French force of twelve thousand men, which was sent to their assistance, landed in Milford Haven, whence they marched to the capture of Carmarthen castle. After the death of the Duke of Gloucester, the earldom and palatinate of Pembroke were next given to William de la Pole, Earl and afterwards Duke of Suffolk. Reverting again to the crown, on the death of this latter nobleman, it was given by Henry VI. to his half-brother, Jasper Tudor, by whom it was held until the accession of Edward IV., who raised William Herbert, Lord of Rhaglan, to the dignity of Earl of Pembroke, in reward for the services rendered by that nobleman to his family. Herbert was beheaded by the Lancastrians at Banbury, in 1469, and was succeeded in the palatinate of Pembroke by his son William, who, however, enjoyed possession of it only for a very short time; for, during the brief reverse of fortune experienced by Edward IV., and the triumph of the opposite party on the liberation of Henry VI., Jasper Tudor was for a short time reinstated in his honours and possessions; and, after the defeats of the Lancastrians at Barnet and Tewkesbury, he retired to Pembroke castle, in which were his nephew, Henry Earl of Richmond, and the countess, his mother. This fortress was soon invested by a Welsh chieftain named Morgan ab Thomas, brother to Sir Rhys ab Thomas, in order to prevent their escape out of the country. But Morgan's brother David, who had warmly espoused the cause of the Lancastrians, hastily collected about two thousand men, armed with whatever weapons they could immediately procure, and, falling on the besieging army by surprise, compelled it to retire, thus giving the Earl of Pembroke, with his young charge, and the Countess of Richmond, an opportunity to escape to Tenby, whence they immediately sailed for Brittany. The last-mentioned William Herbert resigned the palatinate of Pembroke into the hands of Edward IV., on this monarch's expressing a wish to confer it on his son, the young Prince Edward. After the death of Edward V., the palatinate of Pembroke was held by his uncle Richard, the usurper.

Rhŷs ab Thomas, at this time the most powerful subject in South Wales, notwithstanding his protestations of fidelity to Richard, was a secret supporter of the claims of the young Earl of Richmond; and accordingly, when it was announced that the French fleet, conveying that nobleman, was within sight of the Welsh coast, Rhŷs, who was then at his castle of Carew, in this county, marched with a chosen band of followers, well armed and mounted, to meet Richmond, at Dale, near the mouth of Milford Haven, where it had been agreed that he should land. The Earl, who was attended only by a small French force, ill disciplined and ill provided, was highly gratified and encouraged by the number and martial appearance of the troops which Rhŷs and his other friends in this quarter had brought to his support, and at once resolved to take the field, despatching orders to his friends in other parts to join him with their forces at Shrewsbury. Every thing being arranged, the little army already collected commenced its march towards that town, in two divisions, one of which, under the command of the earl himself, passed through Cardiganshire; while the other, led by Rhŷs ab Thomas, took a different route, through Carmarthenshire; the ranks of both rapidly swelling by the accession of numerous volunteers from every side. On the successful issue of this expedition, the palatinate of Pembroke was finally restored to Jasper Tudor, the proscribed earl. After his death, Henry VII. granted the earldom to his son Henry Duke of York, afterwards Henry VIII., from whom, on the death of his elder brother Arthur, it reverted to the king, who retained it until his death. Henry VIII., after his accession, kept it in his own hands, and created Anna Boleyn Marchioness of Pembroke. The act of the 27th of Henry VIII., c. 26. (A.D. 1535), "for laws and justice to be administered in Wales in like form as it is in England," while it entirely abolished the palatine jurisdiction of this county, increased its extent, settling its boundaries and divisions as they now exist, and enabled it to send one knight of the shire and two burgesses to the English parliament, as is more particularly stated below. Since that enactment the earldom of Pembroke has been merely a title of honour. The first Earl of Pembroke created after this alteration was William Herbert, Lord Steward in the reign of Edward VI., with whose descendants the title still remains. In the reign of Elizabeth, when the Spanish invasion was threatened, the position of the noble harbour of Milford Haven, with the facilities which it offered to an invading force, became a subject of deep consideration; and an engineer was sent down by the government to survey the haven, and report concerning the best means of defending it. This person's proceedings, however, were far from being satisfactory to the principal gentry of the county; and a spirited memorial, signed by Dr. Anthony Rudd, Bishop of St. David's, and four magistrates of the county, was severally addressed to four of the leading members of the Privy Council, viz., the Lord Keeper, the Lord Treasurer, the Earl of Essex, and the Lord Buckhurst, and a copy of it sent to the Earl of Pembroke, expressing their great dissatisfaction with the engineer's conduct. The only step actually taken by the government in this matter was to order the erection of two forts, one on each side of the mouth of the haven, which were begun but never finished, and the remains are still called, from their respective situations, the Nangle Block-house and the Dale Block-house.

In the reign of Charles I., although never the scene of any important action, Pembrokeshire experienced its share of the evils of civil war, and several of its numerous castles sustained long and arduous sieges. Pembroke castle, originally garrisoned for the king, long resisted the attacks of the parliamentary forces, as also did that of Picton, garrisoned in the same cause by Sir Richard Phillips; Roche castle, defended by Captain Francis Edwards, of Summerhill; and a castellated mansion which formerly occupied the site of Stackpool court, the splendid mansion of Earl Cawdor. On the first defection of Major-General Laugharne from the side of the parliament, he and his companions in arms, Cols. Powell and Poyer, seized on the castle of Pembroke, and made it their headquarters and the rendezvous of their partisans. It was to this fortress also that these leaders retired after their overthrow at the battle of St. Fagan's, in Glamorganshire, on the 8th of May, 1648; and Cromwell himself, who closely followed them, arrived under its walls on the 21st of the same month, and immediately commenced operations for its reduction a second time, which he effected after encountering a vigorous resistance. The whole of this county, in February 1797, was thrown into great alarm by the landing of a French force of about thirteen hundred men at Abevelen, in the parish of Llanwnda, about three miles to the west of Fishguard. These troops, however, being left by the ships that brought them thither, became disorderly, and, in about two days from their debarkation, surrendered, on Goodwick Sands, nearly a mile to the north-west of Fishguard, to such force, commanded by the late Earl Cawdor, as on the urgency of the occasion could be assembled. Indeed the smallness of the invading force, its want of discipline, and the unaccountable departure of the vessels which had landed it, gave strong reason to believe that the men who composed it were criminals of the lowest description, of whom the French government had taken this method of ridding itself.

This county is in the diocese of St. David's, and province of Canterbury, and is for the most part comprised in the archdeaconry of St. David's, though partly in that of Cardigan, while a few parishes are included in that of Carmarthen: the portion in the first-named archdeaconry is comprised in the several deaneries of Castlemartin or Narberth, Dewisland or Pebidiawg, Dungleddy, and Rhôs; that in the second, in those of Kemmes and Emlyn; and the parishes in the last, in that of Carmarthen. The total number of parishes is one hundred and thirty-eight, of which

fifty-eight are rectories, fifty-one vicarages, and the rest perpetual curacies. For purposes of civil government it is divided into the seven hundreds of Castlemartin, Kemmes, Dewisland, Dungleddy, Cîl Garon or Cîl Geraint (commonly called Kilgerran), Narberth, and Rhôs. It contains the decayed city of St. David's; the borough, market, and sea-port towns of Fishguard, Haverfordwest, Milford, Pembroke, and Tenby; the borough and market-town of Narberth; the borough of Wiston; the incorporated market and sea-port town of Newport; and the little sea-port town of Solva. One knight is returned to parliament for the shire; one representative for the borough of Haverfordwest and its newly-created contributory boroughs of Fishguard and Narberth; and one for those of Pembroke, Tenby, Wiston, and Milford conjointly, the last-named town having been constituted a borough by the act for amending the representation of the people, recently passed. The county member is elected at Haverfordwest, where also the election of a representative for that borough and its contributories takes place; the member for Pembroke and its contributory boroughs is elected at Pembroke. The polling-places in the election of a knight for the shire are Haverfordwest, Pembroke, Narberth, Fishguard, Newport, Tenby, and Mathry. This county is included in the Carmarthen or South Wales Circuit: the assizes and the quarter sessions are held at Haverfordwest, where stand the county gaol and the county house of correction, or bridewell. There are sixty-seven acting magistrates. The parochial rates raised in the county for the year ending March 25th, 1829, amounted to £27,087, and the expenditure to £27,157, of which £22,896 was applied to the relief of the poor.

This is the most western county of South Wales, forming the extremity of the central of the three great western projections of South Britain, owing to which geographical position its extent of sea-coast is double that of its land boundary. Its form, too, is rendered extremely irregular by the many deep bays and creeks which indent its shores, and by the great deviousness of the arbitrary line which separates it from Carmarthenshire. The surface of the whole county is greatly diversified with alternate hills and dales, decorated with rich meadows and corn-fields, and in most parts forms a fine champaign country, admirably adapted for hunting, which circumstance has caused the establishment of the "Pembrokeshire Hunt," noticed in the article on HAVERFORDWEST. None of the hills attain a mountainous elevation, except a chain on the northern side of the county, extending from east to west a distance of eight or ten miles, under the general name of the Precelly, or Preselê, Mountains. These are a continuation of the chain which, further eastward, separates the vales of the Towy and the Teivy, and which, in this county, terminates a few miles to the east of Fishguard. Several of its summits bear distinct appellations. One of the most remarkable is at its western extremity, and is called Moel Eryr: the next, proceeding eastward, is Cwm Cerwyn hill, which is the highest land in the county, and is visible to a great distance in every direction: the easternmost of the remarkable summits is Vrenni-Vawr, which is likewise a conspicuous object from the surrounding country. The height of Preselê Top, according to the Ordnance Survey, is one thousand seven hundred and fifty-four feet above the level of the sea: it serves as a land-mark for mariners, and from some parts of this range of hills may in clear weather be seen the whole county of Pembrokeshire, together with portions of nine others, also vast expanses of the Irish sea and the Bristol channel, the small island of Lundy, and the Irish hills about Wexford. When the atmosphere of the surrounding country is clear, the tops of these mountains are frequently wrapped in clouds, a circumstance which is regarded by the inhabitants of the former as a certain prognostic of approaching rain. In the northern parts of the county, more particularly at a place called Trêfgarn, commonly Traugarn, in the hundred of Rhôs, approaching the western side of it, rise remarkable masses of rock, which, when viewed from a distance, present the appearance of ruined castles, or other large buildings. The most singular feature among these immense masses is a group of rocks on the right hand side of the high road from Fishguard to Haverfordwest, about three hundred yards beyond the point where the road has been cut through the rock, presenting the appearance of several lions, but of two more especially, couchant, looking each other in the face; and, what is still more remarkable, these rocks preserve the same appearance, and that as distinct, though approached within a few hundred yards, as well as when viewed from the other side. The whole of Castlemartin hundred, forming the southernmost part of the county, is distinguished for its gently undulating horizontal surface. The broad expanses of Milford Haven, and its numerous creeks and branches, form objects of the highest interest, from the picturesque and delightful scenery which in so many places decorates their shores. Some of the most remarkable heights, the elevation of which has been ascertained, besides Preselê Top, are Vrenni-Vawr, in the northern part of the county, which is one thousand two hundred and eighty-five feet above the level of the sea; Plumstone Mountain, five hundred and seventy-three feet; Newton Down, three hundred and twenty-two feet; Highgate Down, two hundred and ninety-four feet; and St. Anne's Heights, at the mouth of Milford Haven, two hundred and thirty-five feet. The shores of Pembrokeshire are in general high, and the cliffs perpendicular. The most remarkable headlands, on the north-west, are Strumble Head and St. David's Head, which latter bounds St. Bride's bay on the north. This bay, which derives its name from a neighbouring village, is succeeded, as we advance southward, by the deep inlet of Milford Haven, beyond which the coast continues rocky, and full of caverns worn by the action of the waves, quite round to Carmarthen bay, in which, on the confines of the county of Carmarthen, it gradually sinks into a marshy flat. Pembrokeshire has its coast also studded with a greater number of small islands than any other county in the principality. The first which occurs on the east is Caldey Island, lying off Tenby, about two miles from the main land, and in the parish of Penally: it is about one mile long, and half a mile broad, and contains about six hundred acres, of which one-third is cultivated; between this island and Tenby are various insulated rocks of wild and grotesque appearance, some of which may be approached from the main land at low water. The next two, proceeding westward, occur between Milford Haven and St. Bride's

bay. One of these, called Skokham, or Skokholm, which is extra-parochial, is situated at a distance of rather less than three miles from the main land, and about five miles west-by-north from St. Anne's Point, at the mouth of Milford Haven, and comprises about two hundred and fifty-one acres: it is depastured by sheep, abounds with rabbits, and contains plenty of fresh water springs. Skomar isle lies somewhat nearer the main land, and due north of Skokham, from which it is separated by a strait about a mile and a half wide, called Broad Sound: it contains about seven hundred acres, of which a considerable portion is under tillage, and is in the occupation of a resident farmer: anciently it formed part of the lordship of Haverfordwest, and now constitutes part of the parish of St. Martin, in that town: it has an abundance of fresh water, and contains so great a number of rabbits, that two thousand are said to be killed in it annually. At a considerable distance from these is the smaller island of Gresholm, and several detached rocks are seen in the vicinity. But the largest island on the coast of Pembrokeshire, and of South Wales, is Ramsey, which forms part of the parish of St. David, and occupies a prominent geographical position to the west of the great promontory on which that city stands, being the westernmost extremity of South Wales: it is about three miles long and one broad, and was formerly under tillage, but is now depastured by sheep and horses. This island, and seven rocks to the south and west of it, have received the vulgar name of "the Bishop and his Clerks," probably from their vicinity to the ancient metropolitan see of St. David's.

From the circumstance of this county lying more fully exposed to the south-western winds of the Atlantic than any other Welsh county, its climate is in consequence more humid, its winters milder, and the heat of its summers more moderate. Severe frosts are seldom experienced, and snow never lies long on the ground, generally dissolving within two or three days after its fall. The mountains towards its northern border collect around their lofty summits the watery vapours brought by the prevailing north-westerly winds, whence they descend in frequent showers of drizzling rain, and often in heavy torrents, which surprise the farmers in the more southern and less elevated districts, towards which the streams from the mountains take their course, with sudden and unexpected floods. The myrtle, arbutus, and other tender exotics, which require to be taken under cover in winter in most parts of Britain, bear the open air throughout the winter in the southern parts of Pembrokeshire, as on the coasts of the opposite English counties of Devon and Cornwall; and fruits ripen earlier and more perfectly in the warm humid air of this county than in most of the interior parts of the island. This mildness and humidity render the warm limestone soils so productive of natural grasses, that all the efforts of the farmers to prevent their arable crops from being materially injured by their rank luxuriance, are frequently unavailing. As the climate of the southern maritime districts is remarkably favourable to vegetation, so also is it distinguished for salubrity, and instances of great longevity are numerous. The north-western parts of the county, where the substrata are of argillaceous rocks, are somewhat colder than the maritime limestone tracts, and are more exposed to western storms immediately from the sea; while the climate of the mountains, from their superior elevation and peculiar situation, is distinguished for its coldness and storms. The wheat harvest, except in a few peculiarly favoured spots, seldom commences before the third week in August.

The soils are extremely various, but are generally characterized by great natural fertility. To the north of a line drawn from St. David's, east-south-eastward by Haverfordwest, to the eastern boundary of the county, the prevailing soil is an argillaceous loam, from six to twelve inches deep, resting upon argillaceous substrata of slate or rab, and in colour of a greyish brown, inclining in some places to yellow: the natural grasses on this loam are of a sweet kind, being chiefly sheep's fescue and white clover. These soils, approaching the sea-shore, are of an excellent light texture, and have for ages been famous for the production of barley, with little, and in some places without any, alternation of crops. In most places they contain a greater or less quantity of grey porous stones, which, as imbuing the salts and moisture wafted from the sea by westerly winds, are known to be highly favourable to vegetation, affording in dry summers a perpetual moisture to the roots of the corn, while their surfaces reflect a regular warmth to its blades. The barley of this maritime district is deemed of excellent quality, and some level patches near the shore are remarkable for their early harvests, the adjoining hills acting as reflectors to forward the ripening of the grain: its produce of wheat is neither great in quantity nor of very good quality. In the valleys, the hollows, and the gentle declivities having a southerly aspect, the soils of the northern parts of the county are deepest and most fruitful, while on the uplands they are more meagre in proportion as their substrata of slate and shale are blue: the grey mountain rocks described below, and the pale grey shale, have in these situations by far the most grateful soils. A light peat generally occupies the hollows of the mountains, and the low flat places in the northern parts of the county, and in its natural state is very barren, but is rendered very productive by manuring with lime: its substratum is generally an unfertile clay, which is found near the surface in some other places, where it is always covered with the poorest kind of herbage. Southward of the line above described extends, in the same direction, a narrow tract of fertile red soils, of excellent quality either for tillage or pasture, resting on a substratum of red sandstone. Beyond a very narrow tract of limestone soils succeed the poor wet soils of the coal tract of this county, which have so frequently a clayey substratum and peaty surface; the former is of a yellowish, blueish, or light brown colour, and from one to four or more feet deep; the latter, a mixture of sand and black peaty earth, to the depth of from four to eight inches: these, however, are capable of great improvement, by being compounded with each other in judicious systems of tillage, and, from their less elevation and other natural advantages, are here much more productive than in the more eastern counties. The southern boundary extends from west-north-west to east-south-east, from St. Bride's bay, by Walwyn's castle, to Carmarthen bay, northward of Tenby: the rest of the county southward is occupied by an excellent brownish marly loam of good tenacity, and on the declivities by light and somewhat sandy soils, the crops on which are sometimes damaged by the larvæ of the cockchafer. The substratum of these latter soils is every where limestone; they bear a natural sward of the sweetest grasses, and under good tillage produce abundant crops of all kinds of grain. Wherever these limestone soils are deepest, as in the valleys, their fertility is astonishing; and even on the more elevated sheep downs, where they are shallow, they produce the sweetest and finest pasturage. Enclosed in this limestone district is a singular tract of remarkably fertile red soils of a good consistence, resting on a substratum of rab, or friable stone of the same colour: it extends in length from Freshwater, westward through St. Petrox, to the isle of Sheppey, near the entrance of Milford Haven: its greatest breadth is from this latter spot northward to Nangle castle, a distance of about a mile and a half; and hence, proceeding eastward, its breadth gradually diminishes. While all the other islets on the southern and south-western coasts have only the ordinary limestone soils, that of Skokham has its southern part occupied by the red loams: the general depth of these is from six to fourteen inches, the average being about ten, and for meadow lands they are preferred to the limestone soils, but for corn the latter are superior. A narrow slip of a similar red rab soil forms a boundary between the limestone and the coal tract.

The mildness and humidity of the climate rendering the fertile soils, as noticed above, uncommonly productive of grass, many agriculturists devote their land more to grazing than to the production of corn. The distinguished superiority of the soils, and their remoteness from the mountains of the northern parts of the county, which collect the vapours, have caused tillage to be the most extensively and successfully practised in the hundred of Castlemartin, which forms the southern maritime part of it, from the town of Tenby, on the east, to Milford Haven on the west, and in the neighbouring parts of the more northern hundreds of Narberth and Rhôs. Here is produced the finest wheat in the county, and the greater part of that which is consumed within it: some of the red Lammas wheat of Castlemartin, indeed, has a degree of transparency seldom equalled. The farms are of a mixed kind: corn is cultivated on all of them, while a varying portion of each is applied to the dairy and the rearing of stock. All the ordinary kinds of grain are cultivated. The produce of wheat in the northern and western parts of the county averages from fifteen to twenty-two bushels per acre, though there are frequent instances of much greater crops: on the best parts of the coal tract, and southward from it, about thirty-seven bushels per acre is esteemed a good crop. The produce of barley varies in different situations and under different circumstances, from crops of the poorest class to those of sixty bushels per acre: it is smallest in the north-western part of the county, where this grain is frequently sown in constant succession. Oats are very extensively cultivated, chiefly in the northern and north-western parts of the county: the produce is various, but usually small on the uplands, where the natural disadvantages of soil and climate are aggravated by a constant succession of this crop only. Rye is nowhere grown extensively, except on Flimstone Downs, in Castlemartin hundred. Peas are sometimes sown, but the climate is too humid for them to produce much seed. Beans are occasionally cultivated on the stronger soils. Vetches and buck-wheat are likewise only occasional crops. Potatoes are a common agricultural crop; and turnips are sometimes grown, but frequently suffer from being overrun by natural grasses. Cole-seed has been cultivated in a few places, more particularly on the reclaimed waste of Castlemartin Corse. The artificial grasses are of the ordinary kinds: burnet grows wild on the downs of Castlemartin, intermingled with an abundance of yarrow. Nearly one-half of the county is in meadow and pasture. The limestone and red soil tracts of the southern parts of it possess the finest meadows possible, in which the herbage is naturally of the sweetest kind, many old pastures being entirely covered with white clover in the greatest abundance; but the dry porous nature of the limestone renders those which have this rock for a substratum of but a secondary quality for grazing. The principal fattening pastures, however, are in the hundred of Castlemartin. It is a common practice in this county to fog the grass lands, that is, to keep them without stock from June until March, which the mildness of the winter admits of being done without detriment to the grass, and which is found greatly to increase the quantity and ameliorate the quality of the spring pasturage. Irrigation is practised by some farmers in the valleys of the limestone, sandstone, and slate tracts; but in the coal districts, in addition to the natural wetness of the soils, the water rising there carries with it mineral particles very hurtful to vegetation: the want of brooks and springs is much felt in the limestone districts of Castlemartin, &c. The manures employed, besides the ordinary ones of the farm-yard, are various. Lime is the principal, and is used in great quantities, more particularly in the southern parts of the county, where the stone is quarried and burned with the culm or refuse of the stone coal of the adjacent measures. Sea-weed, sea-wrack, sea-thong or tang, sea-ore, or, as it is called by the Welsh, gwymmon, is found in great abundance after gales in the bays and creeks, more particularly of the western coast: this is extensively used as a manure on the adjacent lands, sometimes in its natural state, at others not until it has been putrified by lying in heaps for two or three weeks, and sometimes again in composts with other manures: the fertility which it imparts, however, is wholly exhausted by the first crop. Shelly sea-sand is abundantly applied to the lands bordering on the western and north-western coasts, being deposited by the tides in inexhaustible quantities in the various creeks, bays, and mouths of rivers, on that side of the county: it is highly calcareous, and utterly destructive of weeds, but its fertilizing effects continue only for two years. Ashes of all kinds are also used. Paring and burning is practised only on some of the peaty lands: the folding of sheep has been customary from time immemorial. The ploughs in common use are of the large, awkward, old-fashioned Welsh kind: the share is blunt and almost like a large wedge, the coulter equally awkward, and the mould-board nothing more than a round stake, fastened from the right side of the heel of the share to the hind part of the plough: this last is intended to turn the furrow, which, however, it frequently does not perform, but leaves the ground in the most rugged and unsightly state. Some smaller modern improved kinds have been introduced, especially the Rotherham swing-plough. The agricultural vehicles in common use are carts, which are commonly drawn by two oxen yoked abreast, with a long pole between them, which answers the purpose of shafts, preceded by a pair of horses also abreast; but the use of a horse in a cart having shafts is becoming daily more general.

The oxen are as active as the horses, and the expedition which the teams use in conveying coal and culm to Sander's-foot and similar places, where the vessels must always be laden during one tide, strikes a stranger with wonder, alarm, and compassion: the usual seat of the carter is, like that of the driver of a chaise, in front of the carriage, where, standing on the wings of the pole, he manages his whip and sometimes his reins with great vigour. The cattle are, with few exceptions, coal-black, of a very superior kind, and in great request for the English markets, where they find a ready sale. Their parent stock appears to have been the small broad native runts of the Welsh mountains, from which, owing to the effects of a milder climate, more nutritious pasturage, and greater care, has sprung the present superior breed of Pembrokehire cattle, which closely resembles that of Anglesey. They are often finch-backed, and white on the belly, legs, &c., and sometimes white-faced, but the latter are far from being preferred by the drovers: their proportions are in general handsome; their legs are shorter than those of the Glamorganshire breed, but longer than those of the Montgomeryshire; their horns are of a middle size, those of the oxen being generally strong and curving upwards; and their heads, necks, and breasts, are of a finer form than those of the Anglesey cattle, but not so fine as those of the Glamorganshire breed. Their disposition is rather intractable, but they are distinguished for their aptness to fatten: the average weight of the oxen is from nine to ten score lb. per quarter, though sometimes much more in Castlemartin hundred: the hair of these cattle has a peculiarly rich waving silkiness: the Castlemartin bull is universally admired and esteemed. The sheep are of different kinds. The Preselè range of mountains, and other walks in the northern and north-western parts of it, are depastured by the small, wild, hardy, mountain breed, which occupy the greater part of the rest of the principality, but which, in the enclosures of this county, are regarded as of little value, it being impossible to confine them by any ordinary fences: their wool is like their fare, very coarse; but the mutton they afford is delicious, being but little inferior to the finest venison. In the lower parts of the county the sheep are of mixed breeds, between the mountaineers and the Cotswold, Dorset, South Down, and other English races, generally without horns, and weighing from fourteen to eighteen lb. per quarter: the fleece weighs from three to four lb. The Ryeland and South Down breeds are also found here in their native purity, and in thriving condition. An endless variety of mixtures is seen, too, in the grounds of different gentlemen and farmers fond of making experiments. Ewes are milked for the dairy in several parts of the county; and cheese made with a proportion of their milk, which gives it a peculiar tartness, is preferred by the peasantry to the milder sort. Great numbers of hogs are reared, chiefly for exportation to Bristol: in a store condition they are called, by the Flemish race of inhabitants of this county, liggies: the rearing of these animals is a chief object of the farmer's attention; they are fed chiefly upon refuse potatoes and whey, and are sold to drovers. The native horses are from fourteen to fourteen hands and a half high, short-jointed, strong, and active: the handsomest of these are broken in for the saddle, being in much demand at the fairs among the dealers who resort thither from the interior of England. They are frequently crossed with blood horses, thus producing a handsome and serviceable horse for the chase, the road, or the carriage. The Suffolk punches, and cart-horses from Herefordshire, have also been introduced; and the greatest attention is paid to the improvement of the breed of horses for every purpose.

The southern parts of this county are particularly adapted for horticulture, and flowers, vegetables, and fruits are here produced as early and in as great perfection as in any other part of Britain. Orchards, however, are not numerous, being most commonly attached only to the mansions of the gentry, though there are a few about Pembroke, and many at the pretty village of St. Dogmael's, near Cardigan. It is, however, much to be regretted that no attempt is made towards improving the species of apples and pears at present met with in the common orchards, which are of a very inferior quality, by introducing new trees and grafts of the best sorts of both. The woods are few and of small extent. Considerable quantities of timber trees on the Picton Castle and Lawrenny estates, with a few surviving groves about Slebech, on the shores of the upper part of Milford Haven, form the bulk of the present stock of timber in that part of the county termed "below the mountains," that is, southward of the Preselè range: northward of it are various considerable tracts of woodland, among which may be specified the numerous groves of Dyfryn Gwain, of the Orlandon and other estates, Preselè woods, and those of Fynonè, or Fynnonau. The most extensive woods remain on the coal tract; yet the high price which is given for poles for the collieries has been one chief cause of the present comparative destitution of wood observable in this county: the prevailing kind of timber is oak, besides which are also seen ash, alder, sometimes beech on the drier soils of the coal tract, and a great number of the less common varieties. In the parks of the greater proprietors in the southern limestone district are seen groves of remarkably fine timber trees, and some of its ravines and slopes are also beautifully tufted with trees. The vast woods which formerly covered Narberth Forest have disappeared, except Canaston wood, which is very extensive and thriving, and a few small coppices, and are succeeded by cultivated enclosures. Some of the principal proprietors of land have of late years made plantations of various extent and of different kinds of trees, which in some of the more exposed situations suffer severely from sea gales. The waste lands of this county are estimated, in the original view of its agriculture by Mr. Hassall, published in 1794, at twenty-two thousand two hundred and twenty acres, of which fourteen thousand two hundred and twenty were capable of being enclosed and cultivated at a reasonable expense, while in the lordships of Llanvyrnach, My-nachlogdû, Maenclochog, and Kemmes, were eight thousand acres on the mountains in the northern parts of the county, which were too elevated, too much encumbered with rocks and stones, and too frequently precipitous, to be susceptible of profitable cultivation. Of the waste lands capable of improvement a large proportion has since been enclosed, the principal of those yet lying in their original state being in Kemmes, containing about five thousand acres; Maenclochog, about two thousand five hundred; and Monachlogdû, about one thousand five hundred; all in the northern part of the county, and exclusively of the more mountainous parts of the same lordships, and of Llanvyrnach above mentioned. All these wastes are at present depastured without stint by the occupiers at large in the several manors to which they belong, and are consequently so overstocked as to be rendered of little value to any one, except to the lesser sheep farmers upon the skirts of them: besides sheep, the chief stock by which they are depastured is young cattle. The most common fuel of Pembrokeshire is the stone coal of its own mines, or rather the decomposition of the stone coal, commonly called culm, which is prepared for the fire by being made into a compost with clay, and formed by the hand into oblong balls; though peat is occasionally used in the northern mountainous parts of it, where it is abundant, while coal can only be procured from a very considerable distance. The Farmers' Club, or Sheep-Shearing, the meetings of which were annually held for many years at Narberth, was at length superseded by the present "Society for the Encouragement of Agriculture and Internal Improvement in the county of Pembroke."

The geological features of this county are peculiarly interesting, as in it are found all the various classes of strata contained in South Wales: its mineral productions, too, are of considerable importance and great variety, but consist for the most part of coal, limestone, slates, and various kinds of building stones. All the northern part, as far south as St. David's, Haverfordwest, and beyond Narberth, is included in the great slate and shale tract of South Wales, which forms the basis of all its more southern strata, and in this part of it exhibits several striking anomalies. The prevailing strata are argillaceous slates, adapted for roofing, of different shades, from grey to blue, with which is sometimes interstratified shale, rab, or roch, as it is variously called, being argillaceous strata of a more fragile texture, which soon decompose under the action of the atmosphere. A great part of the Preselè mountains consist, however, of hard grey mountain rock of a primitive kind, which in many places affords excellent building stones; and primitive trap rocks occur near St. David's Head, the vicinity of which is chiefly composed of masses of this description. In the northernmost part of the county the strata nearest the surface are of argillaceous marl, the southern boundary of which extends from the sea-coast, near Dinas, eastward towards Penboyr in Carmarthenshire: from this line, which runs along the northern side of the Preselè mountains, the stratum of marl stretches northward across the Teivy into Cardiganshire, its thickness varying from six to twenty feet and upwards: beneath it are found the ordinary strata of argillaceous schistus. Southward of the slate district, and resting upon it in geological position, is an extremely narrow tract of inferior limestone, upon which rests a somewhat broader line of red sandstone, a continuation of that which extends over so great a tract of country in the eastern parts of Carmarthenshire, and in Brecknockshire, but which here exhibits much less regularity in the three successive classes of strata of which it is composed: its last appearance, proceeding westward, is in some quarries near St. David's. This again is succeeded by the mountain limestone which forms the northern edge of the great mineral basin of South Wales, but which is reduced in this western part of it to a tract of extremely small breadth, frequently not more than a stone's throw, a circumstance which is perhaps owing to its more sudden dip under the coal measures. Entering from Pendine, in the southern part of Carmarthenshire, it passes by Ludchurch, Mounton, across the Eastern Cleddy to Slebech, Picton, and Boulston, and across the Western Cleddy to Harroldston Cliff, south of Haverfordwest, and to the cliffs of Galtop, in St. Bride's bay. On this limestone rest the coal measures which traverse this county throughout, from the inner part of Carmarthen bay, northward of Tenby, across the higher parts of Milford Haven, to the central shores of St. Bride's bay; their total breadth is only from three to five miles; their northern boundary, commencing from about the centre of the shores of St. Bride's bay, passes east-south-eastward to the north-western extremity of Carmarthen bay; while their southern limit runs in a nearly parallel direction by Ivy Tower. The strata dip southward, and generally form a much greater angle with the horizon than those of the more extensive coal fields of the more eastern counties of South Wales, being in some places nearly vertical, and frequently at an angle of seventy, sixty, fifty, or forty-five degrees. Several faults, or dislocations of the strata, occur in this county: the beds of coal are accompanied by strata of iron-ore. The measures are a continuation of those in the counties of Glamorgan, Brecknock, and Carmarthen, which lie nearest to, and run parallel with, the northern edge of the mineral basin, as all the mineral strata rising southward in the first and last of those counties, and the more central of those rising northward, are lost between the place where they pass under water, on the eastern side of Carmarthen bay, and the commencement of the Pembrokeshire coal tract on the west of it: this is owing to a contraction of the sides of the basin, and to its becoming shallower, for in Pembrokeshire none of the strata of coal or iron-ore lie at a depth of more than eighty or one hundred fathoms from the surface, so that it is only the lowest strata of the formation that extend so far westward as this county, where the basin is too shallow to contain the higher strata also, and too narrow to contain any of the strata rising southward. The coal is of the kind called stone coal, or, by the Welsh, glo caled, "hard coal," which neither soils the fingers nor flames when ignited, consisting for the most part of pure carbon, having neither asphalt to cause smoke, nor maltha to kindle into flame: the great excellence of this coal is for culinary and other purposes requiring a strong expansive heat without smoke. The decomposition of this coal, or, as it is called, culm, is mixed with clay, as above mentioned, and a fire made of this fuel in the morning will often last for a whole day without being renewed or stirred: at night these fires are covered over with a stunning of the same material, on which they feed, and in the morning require only to be stirred for instant service. In Pembroke-shire, the surface of the coal tract not being sufficiently elevated and furrowed with deep valleys for its mineral stores to be obtained by levels or horizontal shafts, as in the northern parts of it further eastward, it is necessary to sink pits, which are numerous. The bed of siliceous sandstone, which, resting upon the limestone range above mentioned, forms the immediate basis of the coal measures on the north, and is called in Monmouthshire and Brecknockshire the "Farewell Rock," continues in the same direction through this county, where it is called the "Doon Rock," and is seen cropping out in stupendous masses in conjunction with the adjacent calcareous strata. The substances which accompany the coal strata, besides freestone and iron-ore, are cleft, or clunch, and fire clay: the beds of ironstone and clunch that lie in the closest contact with the coal are generally marked with vegetable impressions: the clunch also contains vitriol of iron, and in some mines the water is so much vitriolated that it excoriates the hands and faces of the workmen. The quantity of sulphur contained in the coal of this western part of the mineral basin of South Wales is extremely small. Southward of the southern boundary of the coal tract nearly the whole county, for about twenty-four miles in length and nine in breadth, is composed of numberless beds of white limestone, so called, not from its natural colour, which is various, but from the superior whiteness of the lime. The strata generally undulate with the surface, like those of the shale in the northern part of the county, and are distinguished from those of older formation, to the north of the coal tract, by their bearing numerous impressions of marine exuviae, petrified shell-fish, vertebræ, &c., which bespeak their alluvial origin. This stone yields lime of the best quality for manure, whitewashing buildings, and some other purposes; but as a cement for building it is far inferior to that of the lias limestone of Glamorganshire, which rests in nearly the same geological position. Some of the rising grounds of this limestone district have an anomalous deposition of huge beds of fine white sandstone; but the most striking anomaly observable in the white limestone of this county is the intrusion of the tract of red soils on the southern side of the lower reaches of Milford Haven, as above described, the substratum of which, instead of limestone, is a red stone, provincially called rab, more argillaceous than the red sandstone substratum of the red soils adjoining the slate tract, and having some of its strata of a greyish colour. This substratum, when brought to the surface and exposed to the action of the atmosphere, becomes friable, and crumbles into a saponaceous substance, not unlike the slate marl found about Sutton in Warwickshire, though inferior to it in fertilizing qualities. A narrow slip of similar red rab-stone forms the boundary between the coal measures and this great southern limestone district. All the islets and insulated rocks on the southern and south-western coasts are composed of limestone, except that of Skokham, the substrata of the southern part of which are of red rab-stone: this island has also a turbary of five or six acres, affording excellent peat for fuel. In the southern part of

Ramsey are indications of coal, while the rest of the island consists of the strata above described as supporting the coal measures on the north. This variety of mineral strata is turned to great advantage in numerous instances; but the metalline productions of this county are but of small importance. A fanciful etymology applied to the name of a place called Minwear, on the eastern shore of Milford Haven, nearly opposite to Slebech, led some adventurers to search for gold at that place, but without success. Silver has been sought for on a small promontory in St. Bride's bay, but the attempt to procure it there, which has been several times repeated since the reign of Elizabeth, has been as often abandoned with loss. A rich vein of lead in a matrix of argillaceous schistus was worked for some years on the banks of the Tâf, in the parish of Llanvynach; but the works are now abandoned, having been flooded with water, which can only be drawn off by means of an expensive level; the ore is said to be of superior quality. Coal and limestone are the chief mineral products, and are raised in vast quantities in the respective districts above described, more especially in the vicinity of Milford Haven and St. Bride's bay, whence they are exported to a considerable extent. This county contains no furnaces or other works for the manufacture of the iron-ore, of which abundant layers are found interstratified with the coal and its other accompanying substances. From the mouth of the Gwain at Fishguard, proceeding northward, several quarries of blue argillaceous roofing slates are worked in the cliffs on the sea-coast, a material of which the interior of the county also possesses abundance, but which is not there extensively worked except at the Glôg quarries near Llanvynach, situated between the Preselè mountains and the border of Carmarthenshire, which are very valuable; and at Pantè Philip, about two miles from Fishguard. There are also several quarries of slate of the best quality at Sealyham, the seat of William Edwardes Tucker, Esq. Much slate is also quarried at Kilgerran, and shipped down the Teivy; but the quality of all that is obtained in this county is inferior to that of Carnarvonshire. Stones for building are procured at quarries in the hard grey mountain rock of the northern parts of the county, at Newport, and other places on the sea-coast, and at Coed-Cadw, in the parish of Nevern; also from the argillaceous freestone strata of the coal measure; from the siliceous rocks of the red sandstone tract that separates the coal from the slate tract, which are quarried to the greatest extent at Nolton, on the shore of St. Bride's bay, the stone there obtained being of a dark grey colour, and reputed to resist the action of fire and of a maritime atmosphere in a very superior degree; from the various limestone strata, the fracture of which is, however, very irregular and splintery, so that uniform courses of masonry can hardly be worked with them; and from the quarries of blue slate. A range of hills, entering this county from Cardiganshire, and terminating in it in the Plumstone mountain, besides grey mountain rocks or whinstone, affords also indurated schistus, porphyroids, &c. Firestones for ovens, &c., are obtained on the boundary between the limestone and red rab in Castlemartin hundred, in some parts of the red sandstone tract, and in the whinstone ranges of the slate tract. Black marble, variegated with white, is obtained near Tenby. A soft black stone, or black chalk, is found in a rill descending from the Preselè mountains, in the parish of Meliney: the peasantry call it nôd glâs, or "blue raddle," from the colour of the strokes which it makes, and mark their sheep with it: this, without any oily mixture, preserves its strong azure colour on the wool through the whole winter: by some it is considered equal, for the purposes of drawing, to that imported from Switzerland. A vein of excellent potters' clay is found in the limestone near Flimston, in Castlemartin hundred.

Pembrokeshire has no important manufacture. In different parts of it, however, are carried on domestic manufactures of various coarse woollen articles of clothing, which in some instances are facilitated by scattered carding-machines. Considerable quantities of hides and skins are dressed for the Bristol and other English markets. There is a manufactory of brown paper near Haverfordwest; and ship-building is carried on in several of the harbours, particularly at Pembroke, where extensive dock-yards have lately been established for the royal navy. Iron-works at Black Pool, near Narberth, were carried on for many years, and at last abandoned only on account of the great difficulty of obtaining charcoal, the fuel which had been always employed, while the stone coal of this county has not hitherto been found suitable for the purpose. The fisheries on the coast are very valuable; but for want of a regular demand, the fishermen pay little attention to any but those of herrings, salmon, and shell-fish. One of the principal stations for the herring fishery is St. Dogmael's, on the river Teivy, where the boats engaged in it are commonly of from eight to twenty tons' burden, with masts and sails, but mostly open, without decks, and manned by six or eight men: the herrings generally make their first appearance on the neighbouring coasts between the middle and the end of September, which is considered the best period of the season, as they will then bear carriage to distant markets, and, the harvest being commonly over, the fishermen can be better spared from agricultural labours. The fish usually taken on the northern coasts of this county, besides herrings, are cod, haddock, whittings, skate, rays, turbot, bret, plaice, flounders, soles, mullets, gurnards, mackerel, dories, sewin, and a few other kinds. The fishing banks of Fishguard bay are more particularly distinguished for their abundance of turbot, dories, &c., of the most excellent quality: here are also large beds of oysters, which, however, for want of enterprise, are left untouched. There are about seventeen boats engaged in the herring fishery, which continues until Christmas, and the produce of which is wholly devoted to home consumption, forming, with potatoes, a principal article of food among the poorer class. The chief salmon fisheries are in the lower navigable part of the river Teivy, where some of this fish are said always to be in season; at the mouth of the Gwain at Fishguard, and that of the Nevern at Newport; and in both the rivers Cleddy: on the Eastern Cleddy, at Blackpool, there is one more particularly extensive, where also are caught great quantities of the peculiar fish called sewin: below the weir at Llêchrhŷd, on the Teivy, this fishery is carried on by means of the curious little boats called coracles, a hundred of which may sometimes be seen within the space of two miles. Salmon and sewin also frequently ascend many of the more narrow and shallow streams in the spawning season. Extensive fisheries are also carried on, off the coast of this county, in the Bristol channel, where the main bed of fish extends from the vicinity of Tenby (called in Welsh Dynbych y Pyscoed, or "the fishy Denbigh," to distinguish it from the town of that name in North Wales) eastward to Worms Head in Gower, and southward several leagues around Lundy Island: the kinds caught are for the most part flat-fish, such as turbot, bret, soles, maiden rays, and flukes, with a smaller quantity of cod, basse, mullets, and whittings. In the beautiful bay of St. Bride's, too, abounding with turbot, soles, and dories, different gentlemen have their own private yachts, by which are procured an ample supply for their own tables, and a surplus for public sale. Shell-fish are most abundant on the southern and south-western coasts of the limestone tract. In various parts of Milford Haven are inexhaustible beds of oysters of superior excellence, and in such abundance as to render them a cheap article of luxury. The village of Llangwm is more particularly famous for its oyster fishery, which is almost the only means of support possessed by its inhabitants, who are thus employed at a season of the year when their labour is least wanted in the fields: they are, however, small, and the least estimable of the different sorts produced in this magnificent inlet: many are taken fresh to the market of Haverfordwest, besides which vast quantities are pickled in barrels and jars for Bristol and the interior. The "Crow oysters," being those which are found in inexhaustible quantities in that branch of Milford Haven which extends up to the town of Pembroke, and is called Crow Pool, are of very superior quality. The oysters of Tenby, Caldey Island, Stackpool, &c., are remarkably large, but are deemed of inferior quality to those of Milford Haven. Samphire, called in Welsh corn carw'r môr, "sea buck horn," grows on the sea-shore, on the rocks and cliffs not overflowed by the tide: it is gathered, and preserved as a pickle. Laver, or sea liverwort, is found growing on the rocks and stones in creeks overflowed by the tide, and is frequently gathered, well boiled, and put into jars with a little salt, in which state it is occasionally exported: in this county it is called llawran, and by the English "black butter:" its flavour is agreeably spicy.

Notwithstanding the extent of its coasts, the excellence and number of its harbours, and its favourable geographical situation, the commerce of Pembrokeshire is comparatively inconsiderable, being confined to the coasting trade. The exports, however, are various: the principal are coal, chiefly from Sander's-foot, Milford Haven, and St. Bride's bay, for the supply of steam-engines, limekilns, malthouses, and hop-kilns, and as fuel for domestic uses, to the West of England, the western coasts of Wales, Ireland, &c.; lime and limestone in great quantities, and chiefly to the same places; cattle, sheep, hogs, and horses, to England; wool, for the manufactures of the North of England; leather, to Bristol, &c.; and argillaceous roofing slates, which are lowered from the cliffs in which they are quarried, in the vicinity of Newport, into the vessels below. Not only does Pembrokeshire produce sufficient corn for the supply of its own inhabitants, but also a considerable surplus of wheat in the southern, and of oats in the northern parts of it, which is exported to Liverpool, Bristol, and the counties of Dorset and Sussex. From its coasts, as is described above, are also sent samphire, laver, and oysters, turbot, salmon, and various other kinds of fish, to Bristol and the interior of South Britain. Sander's-foot, in the inner part of Carmarthen bay, is a noted place for the export, during summer, of stone coal and culm, which are shipped on board vessels lying on the open beach. Proceeding westward along the coast, the next port is Tenby, celebrated as a place of great and fashionable resort for the purpose of sea-bathing, and which, with that of Haverfordwest, is subject, according to the regulations of the custom-house, to the port of Pembroke. Haverfordwest, being situated the most favourably of the three, near the centre of the county, engrosses most of its commerce. Both the latter are situated on branches of the magnificent harbour of Milford, the finest in Great Britain, the mouth of which opens south-westward into the wide expanse of the lower part of the Bristol channel, while inland it stretches for many miles directly eastward, and afterwards, in its highest reaches, northward, through the coal tract. The navigable length of this haven, from its mouth, up the Western Cleddy, to Haverfordwest, is about twenty-one miles; and from its mouth, up the Eastern Cleddy, to Canaston bridge, about twenty miles: its breadth, at the mouth, between the Dale and Nangle blockhouses, is two thousand five hundred and eighty yards; and from Bicton Point to Thorn Island, two thousand three hundred yards. Exclusively of the various roads, bays, and creeks, it has the following main pills, or branches, all on the southern side of it; viz., Pennar Mouth Pill, Cosheston Pill, Carew Pill, and Creswell Pill. Pennar Mouth Pill is that which extends up to the town of Pembroke: its mouth from rock to rock is only two hundred yards wide at high water, and one hundred and twelve at low water, with from nine to twelve feet depth of water; but within it expands into a fine spacious basin, called Crow Pool. Various reports have been made concerning the capaciousness of Milford Haven: one states that it would contain with ease more than all the navies of Europe; and another, by a naval officer, computes that it would contain one thousand ships of the line, one thousand fifty-gun ships, one thousand frigates, one thousand sloops of war, and one thousand transports to supply them, without in the least degree incommoding each other; while one hundred sail of the line might be brought to act simultaneously on any ship or number of ships that might attempt the haven. Several plans have at various times been proposed for increasing its natural conveniences for trade, and the execution of some of them has much augmented its commerce, and given rise to the town of Milford, the custom-house at which place extends its jurisdiction round the coast of St. Bride's bay to St. David's. In the spacious bay of St. Bride's are several little creeks, which afford shelter to numerous small vessels employed in the coal, culm, and limestone trades; and in the western curve of this bay, to the north of the coal tract, is situated the thriving little sea-port of Solva, which carries on a coasting trade with the neighbouring ports, particularly Milford, and with Bristol. Beyond the promontory of the eight rocks called "the Bishop and his Clerks," and situated on a small bay to the east of Strumble Head, is the port of Fishguard, the harbour of which is the only one free from obstructions and bars between Milford Haven and St. Tudwal's Roads, on the coast of Carnarvonshire: this harbour is of an irregular form, about two thousand four hundred feet long, by one thousand one hundred and sixty feet wide, and often affords shelter to the Irish packets driven hither by stress of weather. Newport, a few miles further north-eastward, has a small bar harbour for a few coasting vessels and fishing boats.

The principal rivers are, the Western Cleddy, the Eastern Cleddy, the Gwaun or Gwain, the Nevern, and the Teivy. The Western Cleddy, called Cleddy Gwyn, or "the Fair," rises at Llygad Cleddy, or "the Eye of Cleddy," in the parish of Llanvair-Nantgwyn, near Fishguard, and flows at first south-eastward by the church and bridge of Llanstinan, then westward towards Llangwaren, and afterwards southward, receiving numerous smaller brooks, until, at the distance of about thirteen miles from its source, it reaches the town of Haverfordwest, where it becomes navigable for ships of small burden: continuing its southerly course for a few miles, until its waters become perfectly salt, this river, at last inclining a little south-eastward between Hookwood and Boulston, is joined by the broad stream of the Eastern Cleddy at Picton Point, about five miles below Haverfordwest. The Eastern Cleddy, or Cleddy Dû, "the Black, or Swarthy," rises among the Precelly mountains, at a place called Blaen y gors, in the parish of Mynachlog-ddû, and, receiving numerous smaller streams from the same elevated region, takes a course nearly southward, forming the boundary between the counties of Pembroke and Carmarthen, until near Llandissilio: below Egremont it is joined by the powerful stream of the Syvynney, which flows into it by Longbridge from Walton: above Slebech it becomes navigable for small vessels, and having gradually assumed a westerly direction, a little below that place, between Picton and Mynwere, it joins the Western Cleddy, as above described. The united waters of these rivers immediately form a salt-water æstuary of about a mile in breadth, which constitutes the upper extremity of the magnificent harbour of Milford Haven, called by the Welsh Aber Dau Gledly, "the Mouth or Æstuary of the two Cleddys," the length of which, from the junction of the two rivers to the open sea, is about sixteen miles, while its breadth, owing to the great irregularity of its rocky shores, varies from one to two miles. The Gwaun, or Gwain, has its source in the Preselè mountains, whence it pursues a romantic course of about twenty miles westward to the Irish channel at Fishguard, where it forms the best harbour in the county, next to that of Milford. The Nevern, which has a similar origin, near the mountain of Vrenni Wawr, enters the same sea at Newport, after a course of about fifteen miles, forming at its mouth a harbour for vessels of about one hundred tons' burden. The Newgall, the first stream that occurs to the northward of Milford Haven, flows westward along the boundary between the slate and coal tracts, and discharges its waters into St. Bride's bay, at the Newgall Sands, after forming, in the latter part of its course, the boundary between the hundreds of Rhôs and Dewisland. A little further northward is the Solva, or Solvach, which, at the little town of that name, forms a harbour for coasting vessels of from a hundred to a hundred and fifty tons' burden, and immediately below falls into St. Bride's bay. On the north-eastern side of the county, the little river Cych, which has its source in the Preselè range, flowing northward, forms the boundary between this county and that of Carmarthen, until it falls into the Teivy a little below Kenarth. It is at this point that the latter river first touches Pembrokeshire, of which it henceforward forms the northern boundary, becoming navigable for barges at Llèchrhŷd bridge, and for vessels of two hundred tons at Cardigan bridge. Pembrokeshire is wholly indebted to nature for its valuable inland navigation, having no canal whatever. It has a greater abundance of excellent materials for the making and repairing of roads than any other county of South Wales, even its slate district abounding in many places with siliceous rocks, equal in durability to the imported granite paving-stones of London; yet, notwithstanding this advantage, its roads are on the whole among the worst in the principality. The best line is the direct route to Milford (which was improved through the intervention of the directors of the General Post-Office), with its branch from Narberth to Tenby. The cross roads, notwithstanding the exertions of some of the most influential persons in the county, are for the most part greatly neglected. The road from London to St. David's, by Oxford and Gloucester, joined by that from London to Haverfordwest through Cardiff, enters this county from St. Clear's, in Carmarthenshire, at Tavern Spite, and proceeds through the town of Haverfordwest to St. David's. The road to Milford branches from this at Haverfordwest; those to Narberth, Pembroke, and Tenby, at Cold-blow, two miles from Narberth; and that to Wiston, from the vicinity of Canaston bridge. The road from London to Cardigan, continued to St. David's, branches from the first-mentioned road at Llandovery, in Carmarthenshire, and, crossing the Teivy into Pembrokeshire from the town of Cardigan, passes through Newport and Fishguard to St. David's: from Troedysaur, in Cardiganshire, a branch diverges either by Newcastle or Llèchrhŷd bridge, to Kilgerran. The mail for Ireland arrives daily at Milford, by the route through Bristol, Swansea, and Carmarthen, from which last-named place it travels the road first above-mentioned. Preparations, which will be completed in the course of the year 1833, are now actively in progress for the embarkation of the Irish mail at Pembroke, where the erection of a new pier is already in a state of great forwardness: a new line of road has also been marked out, and partly formed, by which the route of this mail to the new place of embarkation will be rendered much shorter than that to Milford.

The remains of antiquity are various; but the most striking and numerous are those of fortresses erected by the Norman invaders of Pembrokeshire and their immediate descendants, and of castellated mansions of a later period. The peninsula of Castlemartin contains a few scattered relics of a kind usually considered Druidical, among which are those of a cromlech. Similar remains, but very rude and on a small scale, consisting for the most part of single upright stones, are also very numerous in the vicinity of St. David's: at Long-house, near the village of Trevine, is a cromlech, the table stone of which is about eighteen feet long;

nearer Fishguard, at Treslanog, there is another monument of the same kind, fourteen feet long, and about eight broad; and several others are visible near Trêhowel, at a place called Trêv Cilhwch. In the vicinity of Newport are also many Druidical remains, the principal of which is a very remarkable cromlech, which stands near Pentre Evan, the covering stone of which is eighteen feet long and nine broad, and rests on supporters a considerable height above the surface of the ground. Another large and perfect monument of the same kind stands between the town of Newport and the sea, and is called Llêch y drybedd. The remains of the Roman station Ad Vigesimum are situated a few miles within the eastern boundary of the county, and north-east of the church of Ambleston. A little westward from this station, near the village of Ford, are remains of a small camp of Roman construction; and in the same vicinity, in the year 1806, were discovered some relics of a Roman bath. The exact position of the city or station of Menapia has never been satisfactorily ascertained: it is considered to have been situated on the coast, and that the encroachments of the sea, or the accumulation of sand, have obliterated all traces of it. Mr. Fenton, the intelligent tourist, was inclined to consider Porthmawr, to the north-west of St. David's, or the sandy burrows in its vicinity, as most likely to be the site of the ancient Menapia, in which opinion his friend, Sir R. C. Hoare, concurs. Near Llanrian there is a military intrenchment called Castell Hâvod, considered by Mr. Fenton to have been a castrum æstivum, or summer camp, of the Romans, and situated near the course of the Roman road leading from Loventium to Menapia. Near the shores of St. Bride's bay, in the vicinity of Solva, is Poyntz Castle, an artificial mound, supposed to have been the site of a Roman watch-tower. The great Roman road, the Via Julia Maritima, entering from Carmarthenshire, is supposed to have passed in the line of the present mountain road through the centre of the station Ad Vigesimum; and, a little further, evidence of its course is yet found in the name of a farm called Streetland: from the latter place this road may be traced by occasional fragments, in a line nearly north-west, towards Menapia, the last station in this direction. The Roman road connecting the station Loventium, situated at Llanio, in the Vale of Teivy, above Lampeter in Cardiganshire, with that of Menapia enters Pembrokeshire from the northern part of Carmarthenshire, in the upper part of the parish of Llanvynach, and its course may be clearly traced in several places, more particularly on Cwm Cerwyn mountain, a distinguished summit of the Preselè chain, where it is marked by a range of tumuli. Much of it has, however, been covered by accumulations of peat; but the portions of it yet remaining in this county, which are considerable, have received the name of Via Flandrica, or "Flemish Way," from an erroneous supposition of its having been formed by the Flemish settlers. Some traces of a paved way have also been discovered near the Newgall Sands, in St. Bride's bay, which have been supposed to be fragments of a Roman road leading along the coast from Menapia to Dale, near the entrance of Milford Haven. Near the village of Rudbaxton, about four miles north of Haverfordwest, there is a circular

British encampment, on the summit of a steep conical hill, having a single ditch of great depth: this is sometimes called "the Rath," and in old maps is designated as "St. Leonard's Castle." A little further northward is Castell Henry, or Hêndrev, a large mound, probably the site of a small fortress. In the neighbourhood of the village of Ford, besides the Roman remains above mentioned, there are also various other ancient military earthworks, the most remarkable of which are, a spacious circular encampment on a farm called Smerton, or Summerton, near the village of Little Newcastle; and a circular intrenchment called Castell Coning, near the village of St. Dogwell's. Near Llanrian, on an elevated rock called Garn vawr, is a large British encampment, having lofty ramparts of loose stones; and in the grounds of Picton Castle, near Slebech, are some remains of an ancient intrenched fortification called Castle Lake. On the shore of the peninsula of Castlemartin are numerous military earthworks, some of considerable strength, considered to have been raised by the Danish and other maritime marauders, who so frequently infested this coast, and which were probably designed only to secure their plunder, and cover their retreat to their ships. Near Oriulton, in the same peninsula, on a common called Dry Burrows, are a great many tumuli; and numerous similar mounds, supposed to be sepulchral, are scattered near the sea-coast between St. David's and Fishguard: of the latter, one of the most remarkable is that at Trêv Ednyved, near Llanrian, which, on being opened, was found to contain a kistvaen. In the more immediate vicinity of Fishguard are some other very curious remains of remote antiquity, consisting of sepulchral tumuli and foundations of buildings, in the former of which have been discovered urns and other articles of great antiquarian curiosity.

The religious houses appear to have been more numerous than in any other Welsh county. At the period of the Reformation there was at St. David's, besides the episcopal establishment, a college of Secular priests; at St. Dogmael's there was a Benedictine monastery, which had a cell in Caldey Island; at Haverfordwest, a priory of Augustine canons; at Lawhaden, a small priory and a hospital; at Newport, a house of Augustine friars; at Pembroke, a Benedictine cell; at Pill, commonly called Hubberston Pill, in the parish of Steynton, a Benedictine priory; at Slebech, a preceptory of Knights Hospitallers; and at Tenby, two hospitals. There are interesting remains of the abbey of St. Dogmael's, near Cardigan, and extensive ruins of the subordinate priory in Caldey Island, including the tower of the conventual church, surmounted by a stone spire; of Pill priory, at the upper extremity of Hubberston Creek, a branch of Milford Haven; and of that of Haverfordwest, situated on the banks of the Western Cleddy, a little below that town. There are also some remains of an ancient monastic edifice near Marlan's or Mawdlen's bridge, a little westward from Haverfordwest. The most remarkable specimens of ecclesiastical architecture are seen in the cathedral church of St. David's, for the most part in the Anglo-Saxon, or early Norman style, and in the parish churches of Carew, St. Mary at Haverfordwest, Milford, Nevern (one of the largest in the county), Slebech, anciently belonging to a Commandery of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, and Tenby. The following are also well worthy of notice, viz., the chapel of St. Mary's College, at St. David's; the ruins of the chapels of St. Justinian and St. Non, on the sea-coast in the vicinity of that city; and the chapel or hermitage of St. Govan, romantically situated among the precipices on the sea-coast of Castlemartin. The ancient mural fortresses of this county, owing to its peculiar political situation during the encroachments upon Wales by the Norman conquerors of England, are particularly numerous; but the only one which retains its pristine magnificence, and is at present inhabited, is Picton Castle, the noble mansion of Sir Richard Bulkeley Philipps, Bart., situated on the western side of the Eastern Cleddy, a little below the village of Slebech. The ruins of the castle of Benton, on the western shore of Milford Haven, are particularly picturesque; those of Carew Castle, at the head of a southern branch of the haven, extensive and magnificent; those of the castle of Kilgerran, on the banks of the Teivy, peculiarly striking, the circular arch which so frequently occurs in them bespeaking the early Norman origin of this fortress; those of Manorbeer Castle, near Tenby, extensive and magnificent; those of Narberth Castle, interesting and picturesque; those of Newport Castle, remarkable; those of Pembroke Castle, strikingly grand; those of Roche Castle, near St. Bride's bay, between Haverfordwest and St. David's, distinguished for the singularity of their situation on the summit of a high, abrupt, and isolated rock; those of Tenby Castle, extensive and grand; and those of Wiston Castle, also worthy of remark. On the hill above the church of Nevern are some remains of an ancient fortress, once of great strength, now called Llanhyver Castle. An artificial mound, some distance westward of Milford, indicates the site of the ancient fortress of Walwyn's Castle, or Castell Gwalchmai. The strong and lofty walls of the ancient town of Tenby are still, in some places, nearly entire; and a large portion of the north wall of Pembroke, with some of the bastions, is still in good preservation; as is also the east gate of the ancient city of St. David's. Some remains are yet visible of the block-houses erected at the entrance of Milford Haven in the reign of Elizabeth.

The number of ancient mansions formerly to be seen was as remarkable as the number of castles. Very few of these, however, are now standing; but the ruins of several yet remain, at Trêvlyne, Scotsborough, &c. The ruins of Lawhaden or Llewaden Castle, near Narberth, once a principal and magnificent residence of the bishops of St. David's, are very striking, and include a grand entrance gateway and an octagon tower of great height; and those of Llan-Vydd, now Lamphey Court, another ancient princely residence of the same prelates, situated between Pembroke and Tenby, are remarkably picturesque and curious; as are also those of another of their episcopal mansions, at St. David's. At the village of Dale is a remarkable castellated mansion, which has been modernized, and now forms a handsome edifice with wings. Formerly there were also mansions of ancient erection at St. Bride's; at Blaenybylan, or Lybylan, near Kilgerran; near Slebech; at Landshipping, on the Eastern Cleddy; and at a place lower down on this river; at Prendergast, a suburb of Haverfordwest; at Boulston, in the same vicinity; and at Trêvgarn, nearer to Fishguard: but only very few vestiges of these are now discernible. Among the numerous modern seats of the nobility and gentry which adorn this county may more particularly be noticed, Amroath, the residence of the Rev. Mr. Biddulph; St. Botolph's, that of A. J. Stokes, Esq.; Boulston, that of R. J. Ackland, Esq.; Brownslade, that of John Mirehouse, Esq.; Cilwendêg, that of Morgan Jones, Esq.; Clareston, that of G. C. Roch, Esq., Creselly, that of J. H. Allen, Esq.; Fynonê, that of Mrs. Colby; Glynamel, that of John Fenton, Esq.; Lamphey Court, that of Charles Matthias, Esq.; Llanstinan, that of Colonel Owen; Llwyn-gwair, that of George Bowen, Esq.; Orielson, that of Sir John Owen, Bart.; Priskilly Forest, that of J. Hill Harries, Esq.; Rhôs-ygilwen, that of John Humphries, Esq.; Ridgeway, that of Mrs. Foley; Sealyham, that of W. Edwardes Tucker, Esq.; Slebech Hall, the elegant residence of the Baron de Rutzen; and Stackpole Court, the splendid mansion of Earl Cawdor.

It is a peculiarity observable in this county that the cottages, and even the farm-houses in the greater part of it, are frequently built of mud, notwithstanding the abundance of much superior materials; a circumstance which is considered to be owing to a practise perpetuated among the descendants of the Flemish emigrants. Besides their predilection for mud walls, and round wattle and dab chimneys, there are other peculiarities in the mode of building practised by this race of people, which were formerly much more striking and general than at present: the chimney commonly rises from the front wall close to the door; and the farm-houses have frequently a transverse roof crossing the main one at right angles, while the chimney rises from the junction of the eaves of both. The cottages are altogether of a very mean description; and the farm-buildings commonly of a very inferior kind, excepting some of those of modern erection. In the limestone tracts of the southern parts of the county, where the fissures of the dry limestone substrata absorb all the rain water in a very short time, it is found necessary to construct water-ponds with stone and lime, to preserve water for the cattle. Portable, or moveable, threshing-floors are common; as are also, in some parts of it, stiles formed of solid stone and mortar. Some of the western maritime parts of the county are yet unenclosed; but the extent of these open districts has been gradually lessening for many years. Fences of uncemented stones are common in most parts of the county. Stone fences in exposed situations on the western coast have their copings surmounted by single upright stones placed at regular intervals, which are supposed to break the violence of westerly winds against buildings, plantations, &c. Naked sod fences, and fences of sods and stones in alternate layers, as in Cardiganshire, are also frequently seen along the western coast from Milford northward: the faces of these fences are sometimes wholly of stones laid in peculiar courses. Of the more remarkable natural plants, the privet and wild service-tree are most common on the limestone of the southern parts, and the holly among the hills in the north of it. The bread consumed by the whole of the lower orders, and many of the middle classes, is entirely composed of barley, unleavened, and baked in thin cakes on cast-iron plates: oaten bread is occasionally eaten in the uplands. Servants are hired at the spring and autumn fairs, but chiefly at the latter. Various chalybeate and some sulphureous springs rise, in different parts of the county, as at St. Dogmael's, Llanllawer, Fishguard, St. Dogwell's, &c.; but the only mineral spring of much repute is that called Alum Well, at Treryfydd, or Griffithston, near the sea-coast, a few miles northward of Newport. Golden Well, near the village of Little New-castle, eight miles north of Haverfordwest, is said to ebb and flow regularly with the tide in St. George's channel, nine miles distant. A conflux of springs, called the Nine Wells, at Llandrudion, near St. David's, yields such a copious supply of water as suffices immediately to work a corn-mill. The coast of Castlemartin hundred, from Stackpool Head westward towards Nangle Point, at the mouth of Milford Haven, is highly romantic, presenting some rocky scenery of great sublimity, interspersed with natural caverns of unusual extent and curiosity. Of these, one of the most remarkable is Bosherton Mere, which, on the surface of the ground, presents only a small aperture, but underneath gradually widens into an extensive vault. In stormy weather, when the sea beats with violence against the rocks, the noise emitted from this aperture is tremendous, and sometimes vast columns of spray are forced through it to an immense height: the ebbing of this strong current of air is found to be very dangerous, drawing with it into the gulph whatever animals may be standing near the margin. The village of Trêfgarn, in the western part of the county, derives its name, signifying literally "the town of the rocks," from the extraordinary masses of rock scattered over the adjoining common, appearing, at a distance, like extensive ruins of buildings.

PENALLEY (PENALEY), a parish in the hundred of CASTLEMARTIN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (S.W. by W.) from Tenby, containing 333 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated in the south-eastern extremity of the county, and on the shore of the Bristol channel, comprises a moderate portion of arable and pasture land, of which, with the exception only of a very small tract of common, the whole is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. It formerly belonged to the family of De Barri, of Manorbier castle, and, in the 1st of Henry IV., was granted to John de Windsor; but soon after reverting to the crown, it was granted by letters patent to Thomas ab Owain, of Trellwyn, in this parish, from whose family, on the death of his descendant, Thomas Bowen, Esq., it passed by marriage to the family of Philipps, of Picton. Trellwyn, the ancient family seat of the ab Owens, or Bowens, was garrisoned for the king, during the parliamentary war, by Lord Carberry; but being besieged by the parliamentary forces, after an obstinate resistance, it was finally surrendered on honourable terms. The parish abounds with limestone, which is quarried upon an extensive scale: part of it is exported to the coast of Devonshire, and part is burnt into lime for manure, for the supply of the neighbourhood. Some fine specimens of Madripore are found here. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4. 17. 11., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church is an ancient cruciform structure, and has been recently repaired and enlarged by the erection of a gallery containing sixty additional sittings: on an altar-tomb are two heads in relief, with the imperfect inscription "Wm. de Raynoor et Isemay sa femme, virgo beata Maria Ayt Merci, Amen." In the churchyard is an ancient circular cross of small dimensions, without any legible inscription, the shaft of which is elaborately ornamented with rich tracery. The vicarage-house is an elegant building, surrounded with beautiful gardens, and commanding some fine marine views: it was erected by the present incumbent, in 1822, under the provisions of Gilbert's Act. A neat and commodious school-house has been built also at the expense of the incumbent, in which about sixty children of both sexes are gratuitously instructed: it is supported by subscription, aided by an endowment of £3 per annum, charged on the estates of the late Lord Milford. Caldey Island is within the limits of this parish, for all ecclesiastical purposes. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £52. 14.

PENALLT (PEN-ALLT), a joint parcel with Hêndrevorvdyd, in the parish of LLANGATTOCK, hundred of CRICKHOWEL, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $2\frac{3}{4}$  miles (W. by N.) from Crickhowel. The population is included in the return for the parish. It occupies, as the name implies, the summit of an elevated hill, at the eastern base of which passes the Brecknock canal. The lower part, on the right bank of the river Usk, is well wooded, especially Glanusk Park, where the proprietor, Joseph Bailey, Esq., is now erecting a handsome seat. Glanusk Villa, another pleasing mansion on the banks of the Usk, was erected under the direction of Mr. Nash, for the late Admiral Gell, and is now the residence of John Hotchkis, Esq.

PENARTH (PEN-ARTH), a parish in the hundred of DINAS-POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, on the shore of the Bristol channel, 6 miles (S.) from Cardiff, containing 68 inhabitants. It is situated on the western side of the harbour or roadstead of Cardiff, formed by the junction of the rivers Ely and Tâf, near their influx into the sea. A neat inn has been lately erected on the shore, by the Earl of Plymouth, for the convenience of mariners, or persons desirous of the sea air: the shore is pebbly, and the cliffs contain various strata of alabaster. Penarth Roads form an excellent haven during the prevalence of westerly winds, and five hundred sail may ride here in safety. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the rectory of Lavernock annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, endowed with a rent-charge of £50 by Thomas Lewis, in 1716, and in the patronage of the Earl of Plymouth, as lessee of the great tithes under the Dean and Chapter of Bristol. The church, dedicated to St. Augustine, stands upon a rocky promontory at the mouth of the harbour, and serves as a landmark to vessels sailing up and down the channel. In this parish is a ruin, now converted into a barn, which was formerly a chantry chapel, probably connected with, or served by the monks of, the monastery of Llandough super Ely. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £28. 14.

PENBEDW, a hamlet in that part of the parish of NANNERCH which is in the hundred of RUTHIN, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (S. S. W.) from Holywell. The population is included in the return for the parish. This hamlet is situated in the south-western and more mountainous part of the parish, on the turnpike road from Denbigh to Mold, and is separated from the parish of KILKEN by a small water-course, which also forms a boundary between the counties of Denbigh and Flint. The manor, which was granted by Henry VIII. to Peter Mostyn, Esq., in 1544, is now the property of Major Molyneux Williams. Penbedw Hall, the residence of that gentleman, is a handsome mansion, erected in 1775, and occupies a fine eminence, commanding an extensive and interesting prospect over the picturesque and fertile vale of Nannerch: it is surrounded by a fine park. This portion of the parish is rich in mineral treasure: near the mansion of Penbedw is a very valuable mine of iron-ore, of so rich a quality and of such purity as to yield fifteen cwt. of iron from every ton of ore: this mine produced one thousand eight hundred tons of ore in the year 1826, since which time the working of it has been discontinued. Lead-ore is found in abundance throughout the eastern portion of the hamlet, and, though the mines have been worked for centuries, they are still very productive. The park of Penbedw, though not very extensive, contains some interesting relics of antiquity: in front of the house are the remains of a Druidical circle, one hundred yards in circumference, which appears to have originally consisted of eleven stones, of which only five are at present remaining: the sites of the others, which have been removed, are occupied by thriving oak trees, planted with a view to preserve the original form of this ancient monument. About two hundred yards to the west of the circle is a large upright stone, near which are two tumuli, in a perfect state. On one of the Clwydian mountains, above Penbedw Hall, are the remains of a strong British camp, called Moel Arthur, defended by fosses and ramparts, and having on one side of it a smooth terrace of considerable extent: this fortification, which formed one of a numerous chain of British posts on this range of mountains, communicated with Moel y Gaer, in the parish of Northop.

PENBOYR (PEN-BOYR), a parish in the higher division of the hundred of ELVET, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (S. E.) from Newcastle-Emlyn, containing 1444 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated in the north-western part of the county, is bounded on the north by the river Teivy, and is intersected by the turnpike road from Carmarthen to Newcastle-Emlyn. It contains a large tract of arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and cultivated, and a very considerable unenclosed district of waste land. The surface is hilly and in some parts mountainous; the soil in the lower grounds is fertile and productive, and the inhabitants are chiefly employed in agriculture: the surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £9. 9.  $4\frac{1}{2}$ ., and in the patronage of Earl Cawdor. The church, dedicated to St. Llawddog, a very ancient building in a dilapidated state, was taken down and rebuilt from the ground, in 1809, at the sole expense of the incumbent, the Rev. Thomas Beynon, archdeacon of Cardigan, who also enclosed the churchyard with a wall seven feet high: the present edifice is neat and appropriately fitted up. There is a chapel of ease in the parish, called Trinity Chapel, in which service is performed for the accommodation of such of the parishioners as reside in that part of it, so distant from the mother church. A school has been for many years supported at the expense of the rector, in which poor children of the parish are gratuitously instructed. The churchyard is supposed to occupy part of the site of a Roman camp: a pot of Roman coins was found in the neighbourhood, not many years ago, and part of a Roman road and other traces of Roman occupation have been discovered in the parish. There are several tumuli in various parts of it; and one of larger dimensions is situated near the turnpike road leading over the mountain, from Carmarthen to Newcastle-Emlyn. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £251. 11.

PEN-BREY, otherwise PEMBREY (PEN-BRE), a parish in the hundred of KIDWELLY, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (S. S. E.) from Kidwelly, containing 2645 inhabitants, the number having increased more than one-third since the census of 1821. The name of this place, signifying literally the head of a hill or promontory, is derived from its situation at the extremity of a mountainous ridge, beyond which a low promontory extends into the bay of Carmarthen. The parish, which is intersected by the Dwvry stream, and separated from the parish of Kidwelly by the Gwendraeth Vawr, comprises a large tract of land, of which a considerable portion is sandy and uncultivated, and a great quantity unenclosed, though in a tolerable state of cultivation: a very extensive sandy common is overflowed occasionally by the tide, but affords good pasturage to numerous flocks of sheep, which the tenants of several farms in this and the adjoining parishes have the right of depasturing on it for eight months in the year. The soil is very diversified, but, in those parts of the parish which are under cultivation, by no means unproductive. The substrata abound with mineral wealth, this district being thought to be the richest in South Wales in both bituminous and hard coal, both being worked to a very great extent. The quality of the soft coal is peculiarly adapted to the production of gas, the working of iron, and other manufacturing purposes; and vast quantities of both sorts are exported to various parts of the kingdom. To facilitate the conveyance of the mineral produce of this district, a capacious harbour was constructed, in 1819, by the Pen-brey Harbour Company, formed for the purpose: it is capable of receiving from sixty to seventy coasting vessels of the first class, which can ride here during the roughest weather in perfect security: the pier extends to a distance of four hundred yards from the shore, and the average depth of water is never less than from eleven to thirteen feet, even at low water of spring tides. This harbour being private property, another is now being constructed to the north-east of it, under the provisions of an act of parliament obtained for that purpose, in 1825, by the Pen-brey New Harbour Company, which, when completed, will be open to the public. A canal has been formed, connecting this port with the Kidwelly and Llanelly canal, and pursuing hence a northerly course. A canal from

Cwm Gwendraeth, the centre of the coal district, will also be constructed to communicate with both these harbours, affording additional facility for the conveyance of the coal to the shipping-place. This part of the coast is of difficult navigation, and to mariners unacquainted with it the most fatal on the shores of the Bristol channel. In November 1828, a French West Indiaman from Martinique was wrecked off this place, and nearly all the crew and passengers perished: among the latter were Colonel Coquelin and his daughter Adeline, niece of Josephine, ci-devant empress of France, who, with the other unfortunate sufferers, were buried in the churchyard of this place. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £1400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Earl of Ashburnham. The church, dedicated to St. Illtyd, is a spacious and handsome edifice in good repair. At Llandury, a hamlet in this parish, there is a commodious chapel of ease, where divine service is performed regularly in the afternoon; and in the hamlet of Pendryn was a chapel, called Capel Cynnor, which is now in ruins, and the site is used as a coal-yard by the Pen-brey Iron and Coal Company. There are places of worship for Independents and Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. The Rev. Mr. Pemberton bequeathed a house and garden, and £5 per annum, to a master, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children, of whom there are now twelve on this foundation. A rent-charge of £1, and some trifling charitable benefactions in money, have been bequeathed to the poor of the parish. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £488. 13.

PENBRÛN (PEN-BRÛN), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of TROEDYRAUR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (E. N. E.) from Cardigan, containing 1733 inhabitants. This place derives its name, signifying "the Head of the Hill," from the situation of its church on the summit of an abrupt eminence near the sea, and is sometimes also called Llanvihangel Pen y BrÛn, from its dedication to St. Michael. The vicinity appears to have been distinguished, at a very early period, as the scene of several of those sanguinary conflicts which took place during the fierce struggles for empire among the rival chieftains of the principality, and the continued efforts of the confederate natives to repel the usurpation of their territories by foreign invaders. The names of several places within the limits of the parish are by some supposed to bear testimony to the carnage which ensued upon those occasions: among these, Maes Glâs, Pwll Glâs, and Clôs Glâs (Glâs being considered, though somewhat fancifully, to be a contraction of Galanas), are reputed severally to signify the plain, the pit, and the enclosure of slaughter; Fynnon Waedog, "the bloody well;" and Llêch yr Ochain, "the stone of lamentation." One of those places Mr. Evans supposes to be the spot where the forces of Arthur were slain, through the treachery of his kinsman Mordred; and Llongborth, another place in this parish, is by some thought to be that celebrated by Llywarch Hên as the field where Geraint ab Erbin, a prince of Devon, was slain, with a vast number of his followers, and who is supposed to have been interred on a farm in this parish, still called Porth Geraint; but others think that the place mentioned in the aged poet's elegy on the fall of Geraint was in Devonshire or Cornwall; and Dr. Owen Pughe, in his notes to the translation of that composition, supposes it might be Portsmouth. The parish is situated on the bay of Cardigan, and is intersected by the turnpike road leading from Cardigan to Aberystwith: it comprises a large tract of land extending along the shores of the bay; the surface is exceedingly hilly, and by far the greater part of the land is barren and uncultivated. A portion of the shore, called Traeth Saith, is supposed to be the most favourable place for sea-bathing on this part of the coast. On the beach is a flat rock, called Carreg Morwynion, or "the Maidens' rock," from the circumstance of several females having been drowned while bathing there. The surrounding scenery is for the greater part dreary, and contains few features either of rural or picturesque beauty; but the views over the bay are enlivened by the passing and re-passing of vessels navigating this part of the coast. Within the parish is a small hamlet, or village, called Sarnau, from the remains of several paved roads across a bog in the immediate vicinity of it. Llanborth was formerly an ancient mansion belonging to the family of Rhys ab Rhydderch, Lord of Tywyn; in default of heirs it fell to the lord of the manor, and was afterwards the property of Colonel Bailly Wallis, who sold it to R. Hart Davis, Esq. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacies of Bettws Evan and Brongwyn annexed, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £15, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, and situated on the summit of an eminence overlooking the bay of Cardigan, is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture, consisting of a nave and chancel, separated by a finely pointed arch, and having a porch in the same style: the font is an ancient square basin. In the churchyard are the stone steps of a cross, supposed to have been destroyed about the period of the Reformation. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. This parish abounds with relics of antiquity, principally of ancient British origin; and almost every spot of elevated ground seems to have been occupied as a military post. Castell Nadolig, an extensive British encampment, strongly defended by a double intrenchment, occupies a situation on a farm of the same name, near the high road; and the course of a paved road leading thence northward might some time ago be traced for more than a mile. In a field not far from the church there is an erect stone, about five feet high, with an inscription which was read, by Mr. Llwyd, COR BALENCI IACIT ORDOVS. Under the heap of stones near which it then stood some silver coins, and an urn containing ashes, were found. Bishop Gibson also notices a gold coin, about the weight of a guinea, supposed to be of native British antiquity, and of a period prior to the Roman invasion, as having been found in this parish. Several tumuli and carneddau are seen in various parts of the parish, and the vestiges of numerous fortifications are still discernible. On the farm of Cevn Lletre, in this parish, is a lofty mound of earth, encircled by three ramparts, called Castell, originally a place of great strength, but the fortifications are at present nearly demolished: within a short distance is another tumulus, called Castell Prydd. At Blaenhovnant, another farm in this parish, is a large carnedd; and there are two others in the immediate neighbourhood. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £470. 10.

PENBYALLT (PEN-BUELLT), a hamlet in the parish of LLANGAMMARCH, hundred of BUILTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (S. W. by W.) from Builth, containing 614 inhabitants, the population having increased one-sixth since the census of 1821. This hamlet, which contains the church, is situated at the junction of the Cammarch with the Irvon (over each of which there is a bridge, maintained by the hundred), and on the road from Builth to Llandovery. Many respectable residences are scattered on the banks of the Irvon, and in the neighbourhood of Maesy Gevnfordd, where the petty sessions for the hundred are occasionally held. Near the church is a celebrated inn, called Tavern y Prydd. The vales in this hamlet are luxuriant and well wooded, especially on the banks of the Irvon, and near the fall of the Dulas, contiguous to Maes y Gevnfordd, though the northern declivity of the Eppynt hills is in most places extremely steep, and sometimes even precipitous. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor, is £180. 2.

PENCADER, a chapelry in the parish of LLANVHANGEL AR ARTH, upper division of the hundred of CATHINOG, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 10½ miles (N. by E.) from Carmarthen. The population is included in the return for the parish. This chapelry, the name of which signifies "the head chair," is situated in a vale, on the banks of the Tafwili stream, which falls into the river Teivy; and the road from Carmarthen to Lampeter passes through the village, which is only of small size. It was here that Henry II. arrived with his army, in 1163, to punish Rhys ab Gruffydd, Prince of South Wales, for some inroads which he had made into the territories of the vassals of that monarch, while engaged in Normandy; but a compromise taking place between them, Henry returned to England, taking with him the nephews of Rhys, as hostages. The murder of these persons afterwards by the Earl of Gloucester, to whose custody they were committed, induced Rhys to make dreadful ravages in Cardiganshire and Pembrokeshire. The chapel has been in ruins for upwards of a century, but the cemetery attached to it is still preserved from desecration. An old Roman road from Carmarthen to Lampeter passed through the chapelry.

PENCARREG (PEN-CAREG), a parish in the higher division of the hundred of CATHINOG, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (S. W.) from Lampeter, containing 1178 inhabitants. It forms a pleasing and well-wooded tract on the banks of the Teivy, and is intersected by the road from Lampeter to Carmarthen. A lofty mountain, called Mynydd Pencarreg, extends across the parish on the south. The village is situated on the left bank of the river Teivy: a fair is held here on October 11th. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Pryse Pryse, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Patrick, is a small structure of no architectural pretensions. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians. Within the limits of the parish is an ancient British fortification, of which no particulars have been recorded. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £ 365.

PENCELLY (PEN-CELLI), a hamlet in the parish of LLANVIGAN, hundred of PENCELLY, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $3\frac{3}{4}$  miles (S.E.) from Brecknock, containing 357 inhabitants. It is situated on the western bank of the Usk, where it is joined by the Mehascyn brook, on which are several mills. The manor of Pencelly anciently formed one great lordship, and was, in the 28th of Edward I., the property of Roger Mortimer, who was summoned to parliament that year by the title of Baron Mortimer of Pencelly; but in the reign of Edward II. it was divided into English and Welsh Pencelly, and was subsequently converted into five minor lordships, namely, those of the Castle and the Manor, Pencelly English, Cwm Orgwm, Wenallt, and Welsh Pencelly, to which was afterwards added the adjoining lordship of Scethrog. The castle and manor are now the property of James Gwynne Holford, of Cilgwyn, in the county of Carmarthen, Esq., by marriage with the heiress of the late Thynne Howe Gwynne, of Buckland, Esq. Of the ancient castle of Pencelly, which stood in the village, about a quarter of a mile to the east of the church, scarcely a vestige is discernible, a mansion of the Herberts having been erected on its site, and with a part of its materials; and even of the latter building there now remain only a few rooms and ruined walls, which have been converted into a farm-house. A chapel, dedicated to St. Leonard, stood within the precincts of the castle, but that also has been demolished: it was endowed with a portion of the great tithes, now the property of the lord of the manor. The parish church is situated in this hamlet, which is in general well wooded and picturesque; there are a few agreeable residences overlooking the Usk. It forms the lower division of the parish, and gives name to the hundred. The Brecknock canal passes through it, on the banks of which are wharfs for landing coal and limestone for the supply of the neighbourhood.

PENCOED (PEN-COED), a hamlet in the parish of COYCHURCH, hundred of NEWCASTLE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (E. by N.) from Bridgend, containing 402 inhabitants. This place, the name of which signifies "the head of the wood," is situated on the road from Bridgend to Llantrissant, at a short distance from the right bank of the Ewenny river. A house has been built for the poor, at the expense of £32, out of a sum of £47 left by two individuals; and a trifling sum is annually distributed among them, arising from a bequest by two other persons. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists, by whom also a Sunday school is supported. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £ 98. 15.

PENDERIN, otherwise PEN Y DAREN (PENDERYN), a parish, comprising the Upper and Lower divisions, each of which separately maintains its own poor, in the hundred of DEVYNOC, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (W.N.W.) from Merthyr-Tydvil, containing 1385 inhabitants, of which number, 241 are in the Upper, and 1144 in the Lower, division. The name of this parish, signifying literally

"the head of the rock," is descriptive of its situation at the head of a rock of excellent limestone, from which the large iron-works in the neighbourhood are supplied. The parish comprises part of the extensive common of Hirwaun Wrgan, on which was fought the memorable battle between the forces of Iestyn ab Gwr-gan, aided by some Norman auxiliaries, and the army of Rhys ab Tewdwr, in which the former obtained a signal and decisive victory. Rhys, after the defeat of his army, fleeing from the field of battle, is, according to some historians, said to have reached Glyn Rhonddû, about twelve miles distant, where he was overtaken by the victor and beheaded: according to others, it would appear that he was slain on the field of battle; and others again affirm that, having effected his escape into the territories of his kinsman, Bleddyn ab Maenarch, he was afterwards killed in the battle which decided the fate of that chieftain, in the neighbourhood of Aberhonddy. The remembrance of this event is still preserved in the names of several places in the parish: among these are Bôdwigad, corrupted from Bôdwaun y Gad, signifying "the mansion on the field of battle;" and Cadlan, a name of nearly the same import, used to designate the valley which intersects the parish, in which are numerous carneddau, two of the larger of these being regarded by Mr. Jones, the historian of Brecknockshire, as military memorials, probably connected with this conflict: one of them is twenty yards in circumference; the other is fourteen, and is surrounded by a trench.

The parish is situated in the southern extremity of the county, bordering upon Glamorganshire, from which it is separated on the south-east by the Tâf Vawr river, while on the west it is bounded by the river Hepstê, which, after pursuing a very romantic course through the parish, falls into the Mellte, by which the boundary is continued between this parish and that of Ystradvelltey. The entire district abounds with mineral treasures, the principal of which are iron, limestone, a kind of coal of a quality between the bituminous and the stone coal, a bed of excellent fire clay, marble, and some lead, which last, however, is not found in sufficient quantity to repay the expense of working it. On Hirwaun common are the Penderin iron-works, forming part of the very extensive establishment of Messrs. William Crawshay and Sons, of Cyarthva, near Merthyr-Tydvil: these works comprise four blast furnaces for smelting the ore, worked by a steam-engine and a water-wheel, two fineries, twelve refining furnaces for converting the pig iron into castings, and two pair of rollers for making malleable bars. The quantity of iron manufactured in these works, during the year 1831, was nine thousand and thirty-five tons, long weight; the quantity of refined bars, five thousand two hundred and sixty tons and a half; and the quantity of ore raised, twenty-eight thousand four hundred and thirteen tons, in the manufacturing of which fifty-five thousand seven hundred and thirteen tons of coal were consumed: the number of men employed in them and in the collieries, during the same year, was eight hundred and ninety-five, of whom six hundred and seven were engaged in the collieries and mines. Considerable quantities of limestone are burned for the supply of the surrounding country, chiefly as manure. Facilities are afforded for the supply of the works, and for the conveyance of their produce, by tram-roads from the lime rocks near the church to the Hirwaun iron-works, and thence down the vale of Cynon to Aberdare, where they communicate with the Aberdare branch canal, which, joining the Glamorganshire canal at the Navigation House, in the Vale of the Tâf, affords a direct intercourse with Cardiff and the ports of the Bristol channel. The turnpike road from Brecknock, by the Hirwaun iron-works, to Neath passes through the parish, which is within the jurisdiction of the court of requests established at Merthyr-Tydvil, by an act of the 49th of George III., for the recovery of debts not exceeding £5.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £9.3.11½, and in the patronage of William Winter, Esq., M. D. The church, dedicated to St. Cynog, is an ancient edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, with a massive tower at the west end: it is situated on the summit of the rocky eminence which gives name to the parish, and is kept in good repair. There are two places of worship for Baptists. David Gwalter, of Maesgwalter, in the parish of Devynock, in 1723, bequeathed £5 per annum payable out of the rents of two tenements called Tyle and Heolvawr, in the parish of Ystradvelltey, for the instruction of five poor children, and the apprenticing of one poor child of this parish. Edward Price, of Ewys Harold, in the county of Hereford, in 1797, charged a tenement called Melin Rhydian, in this parish, with the annual payment of £6 to the poor. In this parish is Craig y Dinas, an ancient strong hold, so called from its inaccessible situation on an abrupt, rugged, and precipitous rock of limestone, the base of which is washed on one side by the united streams of the Hepstè and Mellètè, and on the other by the brook Sychryd, which forms the boundary between the counties of Brecknock and Glamorgan. Prior to the formation of the present turnpike road from Neath to Merthyr-Tydvil, the main road between these places led directly up the steepest part of this rock, and through a natural chasm near the summit, altogether impassable for carriages, and even on horseback, except with the greatest danger. This road, which is shorter by half the distance than the turnpike road from Penderin to Pont Neath Vaughan, is still in use. Near this spot are the fine vein of fire-clay and the lead-ore above noticed. Within the parish is the remarkable waterfall called Eiro Hepstè, formed by that river, which here precipitates itself from a height of nearly fifty feet, over an abrupt rocky precipice, sometimes, according to the fullness of the stream, in one, and at others in three, distinct torrents: the river, which is here sixteen yards in breadth, forms in its descent, from the scarcely perceptible projection of the ledge of rock, a single arch, or a series of three parallel arches, under which is a passage between the base of the rock and the descending water. The scenery around this spot is strikingly picturesque and romantic: the common, over which is the road from Penderin to the waterfall, is of the most dreary character, diversified only by huge masses of limestone rock of fantastic form; and broken fragments, which lie scattered round their bases, contribute to diminish the scanty pasturage which this desolate tract affords to a few mountain sheep and ponies. On reaching the margin of the river Hepstè, however, the scenery becomes suddenly changed; the steep banks of this impetuous stream are richly clothed with wood to the water's edge, and the river, concealed in its course by the impending foliage, is only heard to murmur as it rushes through its rocky channel, till, emerging from a thick grove, it forms the cascade above noticed, and, about a quarter of a mile further down, unites with the river Mellètè. Between these rivers is a finely wooded promontory, from which there is a good view of the courses of the rivers to their confluence, and of the fall of the Hepstè, the roaring of which is distinctly heard. The beautiful vale of Neath, with the plantations of the Gnoll, above the town, and the mansion and grounds of Aberpergwm and Rheola, with a fine view of part of the Bristol channel, may be seen also from various parts of the parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £243. 9., of which sum, £83 are assessed on the Upper, and £160. 9. on the Lower, division.

PEN-DERWI (PEN-DERI), HIGHER, a hamlet in the parish and hundred of LLANGYVELACH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 7½ miles (N. by W.) from Swansea, containing 415 inhabitants. A member of a family resident here bequeathed £50, directing the interest to be distributed annually among the poor of this hamlet. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £158. 6.

PEN-DERWI (PEN-DERI), LOWER, a hamlet in the parish and hundred of LLANGYVELACH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 5½ miles (N.N.W.) from Swansea, containing 612 inhabitants. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £121. 5.

PENDINE (PEN-DAIN), a parish in the higher division of the hundred of DERLLŷs, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 3½ miles (W. by S.) from Laugharne, containing 183 inhabitants. This parish is beautifully situated on the shore of Carmarthen bay, by which it is bounded on the south, and comprises but a moderate tract of land, of which, with the exception of an extensive common, affording good pasturage, the whole is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The surrounding scenery is pleasing; and the views over the bay and the adjacent country are very fine. On the beach, which is well adapted for the purpose of sea-bathing, and affords a pleasant walk, there is a natural cavern, from which issues a small rivulet running into the bay. The living is a rectory not in charge, annexed to that of Llandawke, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's. The church, which is pleasantly situated, is not distinguished by any architectural details of importance. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £25. 12.

PENDOYLAN (PEN-DEULWYN), a parish in the hundred of COWBRIDGE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (E.N.E.) from Cowbridge, containing 351 inhabitants. The name, signifying literally "the head of the two groves," was probably derived from the appearance of the neighbourhood at an early period, which, like many other parts of the county, was richly wooded. The parish is pleasantly situated on the river Elay, and comprises a moderate extent of arable and pasture land, which is all enclosed and in a good state of cultivation: the surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied. Within the limits of the parish is Hensol, the ancient seat of the family of Jenkins, under whose auspices an annual assembly of the bards was for many years held in the adjoining parish of Ystrad-Owen, till the death of Richard Jenkins, Esq., who was a warm admirer of Welsh poetry and music, and a good performer on the harp. After this event, in 1721, the estate was conveyed by marriage with his niece to Lord Chancellor Talbot, who was elevated to the peerage by the title of Baron Talbot of Hensol, and whose son added two wings to the mansion, and greatly improved the estate: afterwards it became, by purchase, the property of the Richardsons, and now belongs to William Crawshay, Esq., who has expended considerable sums on its further improvement and embellishment. The present house is spacious and handsome, and is beautifully situated within very extensive grounds, which are laid out with great taste, and comprehend some finely varied and highly picturesque scenery. The parish abounds with limestone, which in general forms the substratum of the soil. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £8.13.4., and in the patronage of the Archdeacon and Chapter of Llandaf. The church, dedicated to St. Cadog, is not remarkable for any architectural details of importance. There is a place of worship for Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. The sum of £5 per annum, the interest arising from £100, of which, £50 was bequeathed by Lord Chancellor Talbot, is annually distributed among the poor. In the parish are several springs, to the waters of which are ascribed medicinal properties, and great efficacy in the cure of diseases, especially those of the eye, and in erysipelas. The names of some farms in the parish appear to indicate the past existence of some ancient encampments; but nothing is recorded of their history, nor are there any vestiges of them remaining. The inferior title of Baron Talbot of Hensol is still enjoyed by the noble family of that name. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £172.3.

PENDRYN, a hamlet in the parish of PEN-BREY, hundred of KIDWELLY, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES. The population is included in the return for the parish. It contains a ruined chapel, called Capel Cynnor, now used as a coal-yard by the Pen-brey Iron and Coal Company.

PENEGOES, or PENEGWEST, a parish in the hundred of MACHYNLLETH, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (E.) from Machynlleth, containing 826 inhabitants. This parish is said to derive its name from one of the petty sovereigns of Wales, named Egwest, who was beheaded near the church: it is situated in a very mountainous district in the western part of the county, and is intersected by the river Dovey, which flows within little more than half a mile of the parish church, and by the turnpike road from Welshpool to Machynlleth, which passes through the village. The mountains afford pasturage to numerous flocks of sheep, and in the lower grounds the soil is favourable for the growth of corn. The manufacture of flannel is carried on in the parish, affording employment to a portion of the inhabitants; and in the mountains of Dylivau and Esgair Galed lead-ore is found, of a good quality. The surrounding scenery, though rather dreary, is of a bold and striking character; and the adjacent country, though not greatly diversified, is still in some points interesting and romantic. The living is a rectory, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese, of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £7.19.7., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Cadvarch, is an ancient edifice, in the early style of English architecture: a considerable portion of the outside is overspread with ivy, which in some places has found its way into the interior. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. An unknown benefactor left £40 to the poor of this parish, the interest of which sum is annually divided among them, according to the intention of the testator. In a field near the church there is a spring, the waters of which are esteemed efficacious in rheumatic complaints: it was formerly covered over by a building, part of the walls of which still remain: the well has been formed into a bath, about seven yards in length and three in breadth, divided in the middle with steps leading down into each part: the average depth is about four feet. Dôlguog, an ancient residence in this parish, is said to have been the retreat of the celebrated Llywarch Hên, who retired to this place in order to soothe with his harp the griefs occasioned by the misfortunes with which the Saxon invaders had overwhelmed his country at large, and his family in particular. Richard Wilson, the celebrated landscape painter, was born in this parish, in the year 1714, his father being then rector here. Mrs. Hughes, wife of the present rector, and sister of Mrs. Hemans, is distinguished for her musical skill, and for having set to music some of the poetical compositions of her sister. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £326.18.

PENIARTH, a township in the parish of LLAN-EGRIN, hundred of TALYBONT, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (N. N. E.) from Towyn, containing 289 inhabitants. It occupies the north-eastern portion of the parish: its name signifies "the head of a lofty ascent," and is derived from its surface being elevated, rugged, and mountainous, forming a part of the Cader Idris chain. On the south-east it is bounded by the river Dysynny, on which is a weir to convey its waters to a mill, and up to this point it is navigable for small craft. Here is a chalybeate spring.

PENLEY, a chapelry in that part of the parish of ELLESMERE which is in the hundred of MAELOR, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{4}$  miles (N. by E.) from Ellesmere, containing 517 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Overton to Hanmer: the remainder of the parish is included in the hundred of Pimhill, county of Salop. There are several respectable residences within the limits of the chapelry. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, endowed with the produce of £400, and a rent-charge of £30 per annum, both the gift of Lord Kenyon, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Ellesmere. The chapel is dedicated to St. Mary. There is a small bequest producing £1 per annum for teaching poor children. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £130.5.

PENLLÊCH (PEN-LLÊCH), a parish in the hundred of COMMITMAEN, Lleyl division of the county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 10 miles (W.) from Pwllheli, containing 268 inhabitants. This place derives its name, signifying "the head of the rock," from its situation at the extremity of some rocks on the coast of St. George's channel. It is composed of comparatively a small portion of arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The inhabitants are principally employed in agricultural pursuits, except during the season of the herring fishery, which is carried on here to a considerable extent. Of the great quantity of herrings taken on this coast part is salted and sent coastwise for the supply of distant markets. The living is annexed to the rectory of Llaniestyn, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is not distinguished for any architectural details of importance. There are some trifling benefactions in money, the interest of which is annually distributed among the poor of the parish, in conformity with the intentions of the benefactors. Cevnamwlch, the birthplace of Bishop Griffith, which, under the head of Llaniestyn, has been erroneously described as being in that parish, is included within the limits of this. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £184. 4.

PENLLYNE (PEN-LLÛN), a parish in the hundred of COWBRIDGE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (N.W. by W.) from Cowbridge, containing 349 inhabitants. This place is chiefly distinguished for its ancient castle, the founder of which and the time of its erection are both unknown; but the construction of its walls plainly indicate a very early origin; and its situation on the summit of a lofty eminence near the village, commanding the surrounding country, shews it to have been a post of some importance. In Leland's time the castle, with its dependencies, was the property of the Turberville family, from whom it passed to the Stradlings of St. Donatt's, and from that family, in default of heirs male, to the Mansels of Margam, together with part of their other estates. The property was subsequently devised by the late Lady Vernon, daughter of Lord Mansel, to Miss Gwynnette, who erected on part of the site of the castle an elegant modern mansion, in which some remains of the ancient edifice were incorporated: this lady bequeathed it to the Earl of Clarendon for life, with reversion to Capt. Tyler, R. N. From the eminence on which the present mansion is built there is an extensive view of the surrounding country, abounding with highly picturesque and beautifully diversified scenery, in some parts enriched with woods, and in others enlivened with pleasing villages and numerous gentlemen's seats. Penllyne Court, formerly the seat of Major Dacre, and now, by marriage with his only daughter, the property of Dr. Salmon of Swansea, is a handsome mansion, pleasantly situated in the centre of a thriving plantation, and commanding some fine views of the adjacent country. The village is small and pleasantly situated; and the turnpike road from Cardiff to Swansea passes through the parish. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £4. 15. 2½., endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Earl of Dunraven. The church, dedicated to St. Brynach, and hence commonly called Llanvrynach, is an ancient and venerable structure, in the early style of English architecture, situated on the south side of the turnpike road, about a mile from the village. Burials and christenings, and occasionally divine service are performed here; but the regular service is performed every Sunday at a chapel of ease in the village, which is more conveniently situated for the parishioners. A school on the National system is about to be established in connexion with the Central Society in London, from which the parish has received a grant of £28 towards the erection of a building for the purpose. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £136. 9.

PENMACHNO (PEN-MACHNO), a parish in the hundred of NANTCONWAY, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 9 miles (S.) from Llanrwst, containing 984 inhabitants. This place derives its name from its situation near the source of the river Machno, which rises to the south-west of it, and, flowing through the parish in a north-easterly direction, falls into the river Conway, which also has its source in a fine lake in this parish, and forms its boundary on the east and north, separating it from the county of Denbigh. The surface is mountainous, and the district abounds with mineral wealth: the soil in the valleys is fertile, and the lands, which are watered by the Machno and other streams descending from the hills, are productive and in a good state of cultivation. The vicinity is distinguished for some fine mountain scenery, and the views from the higher grounds extend over a tract of country abounding with picturesque beauty. Copper, lead, and other minerals are supposed to be contained in the mountainous parts of the parish; and, in 1784, a lease of the minerals within the common called Llêchwedd Oernant was granted by the crown to Mrs. Anne Robinson, for thirty-one years, at a rent of £1. 6. 8., and fifteen shillings per ton for lead-ore, eight shillings per ton for calamine, and one-tenth part of the copper and other minerals. Fairs are held annually on April 17th, August 18th, and October 20th. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £9. 10., endowed with £200 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £1400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Sir R. W. Vaughan, Bart. The church, dedicated to St. Tyddud, is not distinguished by any architectural details of importance. Richard Anwyl, in 1682, bequeathed £200, which has been vested in the purchase of land; Frederick Lloyd bequeathed £100 in money, and a considerable portion of land; Maurice Hughes, in 1723, left £70, and David Price £20 in money, to the poor of the parish, the income arising from which benefactions is annually distributed according to the intentions of the testators. The poor are maintained by an average annual expenditure amounting to £378. 9.

PENMAEN (PEN-MAEN), a parish in the hundred of SWANSEA, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (W. S. W.) from Swansea, containing 137 inhabitants. The name of this place, signifying literally "the head of the rock," is derived from its situation at the extremity of a ridge of rocks forming the eastern side of Oxwich bay, in the Bristol channel. The parish comprises but a small tract of land, of which little more than half is enclosed and cultivated. The rocks on the coast below the church rise with majestic grandeur from the shore, and have a strikingly imposing appearance: one of them, called the Tor, after attaining a considerable elevation, terminates nearly in a point. At low water there is a pleasant ride to Oystermouth and Swansea, over the Oxwich sands, by which from two to three miles are saved in the distance. About six miles to the west of the church is the small hamlet of Paviland, belonging to this parish, from which place one of its churchwardens and one of its overseers are invariably chosen. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4. 10., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. In the hamlet of Paviland there is a small meeting-house, built by Lady Barham. It is in contemplation to erect a school-house, and to establish a school here, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children, in connexion with the National Society in London. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £48. 14.

PENMAEN, a township in the parish of LLANVAWR, hundred of PENLLŷN, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES. The population is included in the return for the parish.

PENMARK (PEN-MARK), a parish in the hundred of DINAS-POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (S. E.) from Cowbridge, containing 536 inhabitants. The name of this place, signifying literally "Mark's Head," is supposed to have been originally derived from the preservation of a human scull in the churchyard, which, according to some monkish legend, was said to be that of St. Mark, to whom the church is dedicated, and which was consequently regarded for many years with religious veneration. This place was distinguished at an early period by the erection of two castles, called respectively Penmark and Fonmon, both belonging to the followers of Fitz-Hamon, and originally built for the protection of a portion of the territories which, upon the conquest of this part of the principality, that nobleman divided among the knights who attended him in his expedition. Penmark castle, which was the property of Sir Gilbert Humphreville, continued a place of strength till the reign of Henry IV., when it was destroyed by Owain Glyndwr, in one of his incursions into the borders, and is now in ruins. Fonmon castle originally belonged to Sir John St. John de Bletso, and continued in the family of that nobleman till the reign of Charles I., when, during the interregnum, it was given by the parliamentary party to Colonel John Jones, an active and zealous supporter of their interests, whose descendant, Robert Jones, Esq., is the present proprietor. The ancient building has undergone various repairs and alterations, and now forms a venerable castellated mansion, the residence of Mr. Jones. The village occupies the summit of an eminence overlooking a romantic dell; and the entire parish, which is situated in the south-eastern part of the county, on the coast of the Bristol channel, comprises a considerable tract of land, which has been enclosed from an early period, and is in a good state of cultivation. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified and highly picturesque; and the views over the adjacent country, which is extremely fertile and richly cultivated, are extensive, and embrace many interesting objects, among which the castellated mansion of Fonmon castle is most conspicuous. A fair is held annually in this parish on the 15th of April. The living is a vicarage, annexed to that of Lantwit-Major, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £8. 13. 4., and endowed with £200 royal bounty. The church, dedicated to St. Mark, is a substantial and well-built edifice, but not distinguished by any architectural details of importance. The chapels of East Aberthaw and Rhôs, anciently dependent on the mother church, have long since fallen into decay. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. Several charitable donations and bequests, consisting of two houses, two acres of land, and about £60 in money, have been made for the benefit of the poor, the produce of which is periodically distributed among them. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £318. 1.

PENMON (PEN-MON), a parish in the hundred of TYNDAETHWY, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (N. E. by N.) from Beaumaris, containing 240 inhabitants. The name of this place, signifying "the head of Mona," is derived from its situation in the eastern extremity of the Isle of Anglesey (anciently called Mona), on a promontory boldly projecting into the Irish sea, at the northern entrance to the Menai strait, and having at its extremity the small island of Priestholme. This and the surrounding country were desolated by the Danes, in 969, and again shortly afterwards, in common with the whole of Anglesey. The parish is not of very great extent, but comprises nearly equal portions of arable and pasture land, in a tolerable state of cultivation. The surrounding scenery is not remarkable for features either of rural or picturesque beauty; and the views, though comprising some objects of romantic character, derive their chief interest from the expanse of waters composed of the Irish sea and the Menai strait. The houses do not form any village, but are widely scattered over the parish. The only metallic mineral found here is pyrites of iron; but the parish abounds with beautiful grey-coloured marble, clouded with an almost endless variety of shades, and susceptible of a high polish. This marble has been long in estimation for ornamental purposes, and for the construction of mantel-pieces, tablets, &c., but its excellent qualities as a solid and durable material for buildings of superior strength and importance has been but recently brought into notice, by its being selected for the construction of the piers and buttresses of the grand suspension bridge over the Menai strait. The pier and quays of Holyhead, the piers of Aberconway bridge, Penrhyn Castle, and many other public and private buildings have also been constructed of marble from the quarries here; and the town-hall of Birmingham, for the erection of which upon an extensive and magnificent scale the proprietor has generously given a sufficient quantity of marble, is now being built with this valuable material. The quarries, which are very extensive, have been worked for a considerable period with great success, and their favourable situation on the shores of the Menai strait on the east, and of the Irish sea on the north and north-east, greatly facilitates the conveyance of their produce to its destination. A great number of men is constantly employed in them, and several vessels, which can come in and load at all times of the tide, are regularly engaged in transporting the marble to various parts of the kingdom. Part of the parish is included within the limits of the borough of Beaumaris.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £800 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Sir R. B. Williams Bulkeley, Bart. The church, dedicated to St. Seiriol, and formerly the conventual church of an ancient priory founded here, was originally a spacious cruciform structure, in the Norman style of architecture, with a square tower in the centre, but the nave and choir are all that remain of the ancient building: the former is in a state of great dilapidation, and the latter, which is appropriately fitted up for the performance of divine service, is embellished with some of the richest details of the most finished period of the Norman style. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The priory, according to some historians, was originally founded in the sixth century, by Maelgwyn Gwynedd, and subsequently enlarged by Gruffydd ab Cynan, who appointed his son Idwal prior, in 1140. Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, in 1220, made considerable additions to its revenue, and placed in it monks of the Benedictine order, in whose possession it remained till the dissolution, at which time its revenue was estimated at £49. 12. 2. The site, with the park and other appurtenances, was granted, in the 6th of Elizabeth, to John More, Esq. The principal remains of this ancient establishment are, besides the present church, the refectory, and part of the prior's house and dovecote, exhibiting massive pillars and semicircular arches, richly ornamented with zig-zag and other mouldings. In the park is a very ancient stone cross, ten feet high, the shaft of which is curiously sculptured with knots and other ornaments; and on the south side are the figures of a saint, and two other persons, now very much defaced. Among the Plâs Gwyn manuscripts is preserved the grant of a free pardon to Robert ab Johns, with a fragment of the seal of the priory, bearing the upper part of figures of the Virgin and Child, with the legend PENMONA + SIG. About a mile to the south of the priory are the remains of "Castell Aber Llienawg," built by Hugh Lupus, Earl of Chester, and Hugh the Red, Earl of Shrewsbury, in 1098, when they jointly invaded the Isle of Anglesey, and committed the most cruel outrages on the inhabitants: the castle, which occupies the summit of an artificial mount, surrounded by a moat, consists of four walls, enclosing a quadrangular area, with a small circular tower at each angle, and was evidently intended to defend the pass of the adjoining valley. Nearer the shore is a circular mound of earth, which was connected with the castle, and most probably thrown up to command the landing-place near the mouth of a small rivulet which runs into the strait. On the estate of Trôsyf Avon, in this parish, there is a copious spring, the water of which holds in solution a sulphate of lime, and contains a considerable portion of fixed air: it is much resorted to, and held in high estimation for its efficacy in chronic diseases. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £62. 12.

Within the limits of this parish is the small island of PRIESTHOLME, anciently called Ynys Seiriol, and now commonly Puffin Island, from the number of those birds by which it is frequented. This island, which is situated in the Irish sea, about a mile to the east of the shore, was originally occupied as a place of devotional retirement; and St. Seiriol, to whom the priory church is dedicated, is said to have built a hermitage here, which afterwards became a cell to that establishment. Considerable uncertainty prevails among the ancient historians with respect to this place: Giraldus appears to have regarded the island as the site of the priory of Penmon, probably from the brethren being styled "Canonici de Insulâ Glannauch," by which name it was occasionally designated; and the remains of a square tower, and the foundations of three others, between which there appears not the slightest connexion, have been supposed to be the ruins of the ancient conventual buildings. Probably the cell founded here by Seiriol, and resorted to only as a place of more austere seclusion by some of the brethren, may have led other historians to confound it with the principal establishment; for the nature of the island, consisting entirely of barren rock, of which the surface is but thinly covered with loose sand drifted by the winds, renders it impossible that any number of men could exist in a state of society on so sterile a spot, incapable of producing any vegetable, and cut off many weeks together from any communication with the main land. The only appearances of building now are the remains of a square tower, serving as a landmark, the foundations of several similar buildings destroyed by the violence of the northern gales, to which the island is particularly exposed, and a hut inhabited by a man who attends a signal staff, erected here in 1826, in connexion with Llandudno on the east, and Llanellian on the west, and forming a link in the telegraphic communication between Liverpool and Holyhead. About half-way between the main land and the island is a piece of rock, displaying itself above the surface at low water from which, in a southerly direction, stretches a causeway, constructed with large fragments of rock on each side, and having the interval filled up with smaller stones and cement. It is in a very perfect state, and extends for a considerable distance into the channel, where its termination is marked by a red buoy. It is traditionally said to have been a road leading across the channel of the Menai strait, which anciently was here very shallow, to the main land on the opposite shore, forming a communication between this place and the coast of Carnarvonshire, now nine miles distant. By whom or at what time this causeway was originally made, is not known; but it may probably have been a work of the Romans, to facilitate the landing or shipping of troops or merchandise, as the remains of a paved Roman road may be traced leading through Penmon towards Llanestyn. Near this spot the Rothsay Castle steam-vessel, between Liverpool and Bangor, was wrecked, in August 1831, when more than a hundred passengers perished.

The island is about a mile in length, of very great elevation, and forming on all sides abrupt precipices, except towards Penmon, where the ascent, though not precipitous, is very steep: the surface affords only scanty pasturage for a few sheep and rabbits; but the island is the resort of various sea fowl during the breeding season, more particularly of puffins or puffin auks, which congregate here in such numbers as to have given name to the island. Some of the inhabitants of the parish are engaged in the fisheries on the coast; and the large oysters found in extensive beds in the sound, which are highly esteemed, after being pickled and packed in casks, are exported to various distant places as "Penmon oysters." Here is also an abundance of crabs, and a great variety of beautiful shells are taken in the dredges of the oyster-men between Priestholme Island and Beaumaris. The sound or channel between the main land and Priestholme, which is of great depth, forms the common passage for ships to and from the roads of Beaumaris; and on the eastern side of the island is another passage into the same roads, which is little more than a quarter of a mile in breadth, and navigable only for vessels of very small burden. Maelgwyn Gwynedd, Prince of North Wales, the original founder of the ancient priory, is said to have been buried in Priestholme.

PENMORVA (PEN-MORVA), a parish in the hundred of EIVIONYDD, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (W. N. W.) from Trêmadoc, containing 982 inhabitants. The parish is situated in the south-eastern part of the county, and the village stands upon a gentle eminence beneath craggy mountains of considerable elevation, and on the turnpike road from Trêmadoc to Carnarvon. The surrounding scenery is rather of bold and rugged character than of pleasing or picturesque appearance; and the views of the adjacent country, though comprehending some romantic features, are neither interesting nor extensive. Clenenny, the family seat of the Owens, is an ancient mansion, distinguished as the birthplace and residence of that independent royalist Sir John Owen, Bart., who commanded the king's forces in this part of the principality during the civil war in the reign of Charles I. He was defeated and taken prisoner near Bangor, in 1648, in the last effort which was made by the Welsh in that monarch's cause, and was conveyed to Windsor, where, being tried, he was, with the Duke of Hamilton and others, condemned to death; but, through the intercession of some of the parliamentary commanders, he received a pardon, and returned to his patrimonial estate, where he died in 1666. Considerable deposits of copper-ore have been found in the parish, and several spirited attempts have been made, and large sums of money expended, in working them; but the ore, when found, was so mixed with iron, that the difficulty and expense of separating it, and the depression in the price of the metal, induced the proprietors to discontinue their works, and the mines are for the present abandoned. Fairs are held in the village annually on March 6th, May 14th, August 20th, September 25th, and November 12th. The living is a discharged rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Dôlbenmaen annexed, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £9. 12. 6., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Beuno, is a small neat edifice, not distinguished by any architectural details: it contains a monument to the memory of Sir John Owen, Bart. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Mrs. Owen bequeathed £60, and Anne Lloyd, in 1783, £30 in money, to the poor of this parish; and there are also some smaller benefactions in money and land, the produce of which is annually distributed according to the will of the testators. On Bwlch Craigwen are the remains of an extensive Druidical circle, consisting of forty-one upright stones, several of which are more than seven feet high; and near the church is a smaller circle, some of the stones composing which have been broken and used as materials in constructing or repairing the neighbouring fences. In 1829, a curious ancient silver coin was dug up, in opening a grave in the churchyard: it was in good preservation, with the inscription, in rude ancient characters round the obverse, RADVLVS DEI GRA. DVX BVRG., and is supposed to be a coin of Rodolphus, Duke of Burgundy, who flourished at the commencement of the ninth century, and was a celebrated collector of sacred reliques. Sir Hywel y Vwyall is supposed to have been born in this parish, the greater portion of which belonged to him. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £279. 13.

PENMYNNEDD (PEN-MYNYDD), a parish in the hundred of TYNDAETHWY, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (W.) from Beaumaris, containing 377 inhabitants. The name of this place, signifying literally "the summit of the mountain," is derived from the situation of its church on a lofty eminence. The lordship originally belonged to the ancestors of Owain ab Meredydd ab Tudyr, husband of Catherine of France, Queen dowager of Henry V., and grandfather of Henry VII., who was born here in 1385. The ancient mansion of that family, now converted into a farm-house, preserves many vestiges of its former owners, and some remains of its ancient grandeur; the great mantel-piece of the hall, some coats of arms of the family, with dates of different parts of the building, and of successive repairs, are still in existence. The last male descendant of this house, from which sprung the Tudor line of English sovereigns, was Richard, who was sheriff of the county in 1657, on whose death the lordship or manor passed to Margaret, the sole heiress, who conveyed it by marriage to Coningsby Williams, Esq., of Glân y Gors, in this county, who possessed it during his life: it was afterwards sold to Lord Bulkeley, whose representative still continues in the possession of it. The parish, which is situated on the old Holyhead road, comprises a very extensive tract of arable and pasture land, which, with the exception only of a very small portion, is enclosed and cultivated. The surface is undulating, and the soil, though various, is tolerably productive. There is a fair on Easter Monday, principally for hiring servants. This place constitutes a prebend in the cathedral church of Bangor, valued in the king's books at £8. 5. 7½., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Prebendary. The church, dedicated to St. Credivael, a saint who flourished about the close of the fifth century, and first presided over the college of Tŷ Gwŷn, is a very ancient structure, supposed to have been erected in the year 630: it contains a very superb altar-tomb of white alabaster, without arms or inscription, removed hither on the dissolution of the abbey of Llanvaes, and supposed to have been erected to the memory of some of the Tudor family; it supports the effigies of two recumbent figures, one a warrior in complete armour, with a helmet of conical form, and the other a female in flowing robes and a square hood: the heads are supported by angels, and the feet rest upon lions. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Six almshouses, which had been previously founded in this parish, were endowed in 1623, by Lewis Owen, Esq., of Twickenham, in the county of Middlesex, with the tithes of the parish of Eglwys-Rhôs, for the better support of the almspeople: these tithes have long been held by the family of Mostyn, who have paid an annual sum for the support of the almshouses, at present amounting to £60 per annum. There are also other charitable donations and bequests of land and money for the poor. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £208. 13.

PENNAL, a parish, comprising the Upper and Lower divisions, in the hundred of ESTIMANER, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (W.) from Machynlleth, containing 776 inhabitants, of which number, 258 are in the Upper, and 518 in the Lower, division. This parish, which is situated on the river Dovey, and is intersected by the turnpike road from Machynlleth to Aberdovey and Towyn, comprises a tract of hilly and rocky ground but little adapted for purposes of agriculture. The soil is thin and poor, but, in some of the lower grounds, not altogether unproductive; the declivities of the hills afford only a scanty pasturage for sheep and young cattle: peat, which forms the principal fuel of the inhabitants, is found in various parts of the parish. The petty sessions for the hundred are held here every alternate month. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £1400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, was rebuilt about fifty years ago, with the materials of an ancient Roman fortress, called Cevn Caer; but, as the building is entirely covered with stucco, the ancient Roman bricks are not discernible. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Sunday schools are supported by subscription, in connexion with the established church and the several dissenting congregations. Of the ancient Roman fortress of Cevn Caer, nothing but the site is remaining. Several coins of Domitian, Augustus, and Tiberius have been dug up in this spot; and in a turbary at no great distance from it was found a spear head, evidently of Roman construction. From this situation is obtained a fine view of the river Dovey to its mouth, and of Cardigan bay, with the Cardiganshire coast, and the country adjacent. At Esgair Llyverin, in this parish, are preserved the bed and furniture for the reception of Charles I., when on his way through this country to Chester, which was removed to this place from an ancient mansion still remaining in the parish of Machynlleth. In the grounds of Pantylludw is a remarkably fine yew tree of amazing growth: the trunk is thirty-two feet in girth, at the height of six inches from the ground, and forty-eight feet in height; and the largest branch is nine feet in girth, and forty-four feet in length. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £331. 7.

PENNANT, or PENNANT MELANGELL, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of LLANYVLLIN, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 10 miles (N. W. by W.) from Llanvyllin, containing 789 inhabitants. This place derives its name, signifying "the head of the brook," from its situation near the source of the river Tanat, which rises in this parish, and falls into the Vyrnwy near Llanymynech, on the confines of Shropshire. The adjunct to the name, by which it is distinguished from other places of the same appellation, is derived from St. Monacella, by the Welsh called Melangell, the daughter of an Irish monarch, who, having devoted herself to a life of celibacy, retired from her father's dominions to this place, where she spent her time in seclusion. St. Monacella had passed fifteen years in devotional retirement at this place, in a small cell among the rocks near the present church, when Brochwel Yselythrog, Prince of Powys, gave her some lands, to which he added the privilege of sanctuary to all who fled thither for protection. Iorwerth Drwyn-dwn, or "Edward with the broken nose," eldest son of Owain Gwynedd, Prince of North Wales, being deprived of his succession on account of that natural deformity, fled to this place for shelter, when his younger brother Davydd ascended the throne, and was, not long afterwards, killed at a place called Bwlchcroes Iorwerth, at no great distance from the spot. The parish is remarkable for the irregularity of its boundaries; some portions of it being separated from others by the intervention of the parishes of Llangynog, Llanrhajadr, and Hirnant; and some houses included within its limits are situated in the market town of Oswestry. It comprises some rich arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and in a high state of cultivation. The surrounding scenery is finely diversified and in many parts highly picturesque; and the views over the adjacent country abound with objects of interest and features of romantic beauty. The village, consisting only of the church and from twenty to thirty houses, is beautifully situated in an exceedingly picturesque valley, enclosed on all sides by hills, except at the entrance, and watered by the small river Tanat. Near the church the vale divides into two branches, the extremities of which are enclosed by two lofty precipices, separated from each other by the vast and rugged promontory called Moel Dimmor, which stretches into the vale: down each of the precipices, at certain times, rushes an impetuous torrent, descending from a considerable height, and forming an imposing and picturesque cascade. The living consists of a rectory and a vicarage, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese, of St. Asaph: the rectory, which is a sinecure, is rated in the king's books at £11. 16. 10½., and is annexed to the bishoprick of St. Asaph; the vicarage, which is discharged, is rated at £5. 16. 5½., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Monacella, is an ancient structure: on the front of the gallery is sculptured the history of the saint, and several reliques of her are still preserved. Her tomb was in a small chapel or oratory adjoining the church, now used as a vestry-room; but her remains have been removed and deposited in the churchyard, under a stone on which is a recumbent figure of the saint, sculptured in freestone with the arms crossed. There is also a stone, with the figure of an armed man, which once covered the grave of Iorwerth Drwyndwn: on his shield, bearing a lion rampant, is inscribed the legend "Hic Jacet Etwart." There is a place of worship for Independents. The produce of some trifling charitable donations and bequests is divided among the poor of the upper division of the parish. On the mountain between Llanwddyn and this parish there is a circular enclosure surrounded by a wall, called "Hên Eglwys," supposed to be a Druidical relic, or probably the remains of an ancient cemetery; and near Plâs dû, in the lower division of the parish, are some remains of an ancient British encampment. On the mountain between Bala and this place was found, some years ago, a large bone called the Giant's Rib, probably the bone of some fish, and now kept in the church. In the left branch of the valley in which the village is situated there is a large stone, under which were found, a few years ago, several coins, rings, and other relics of antiquity. It is said that a Roman road passed near this place, towards Aberystwith; and in many of the narrow passes between the hills which confine the vale are vestiges of ancient intrenchments, probably thrown up for defence. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £385. 16.

PENNARTH, or PENNARD (PEN-ARTH), a parish in the hundred of SWANSEA, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $7\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. S. W.) from Swansea, containing 357 inhabitants. The name of this parish, signifying "the bear's head," is supposed to be derived from the peculiar form which this part of the coast assumes in its projection into the Bristol channel. Pennarth is thought to have been originally of more importance and of much greater extent than at present: the remains of an ancient castle, which appears to have been a structure of some magnificence; and the ruins of the ancient church, and foundations of numerous buildings, now covered with sands, afford striking evidences in support of this opinion. By whom or at what time the castle was originally erected has not been satisfactorily ascertained: its foundation has by some writers been ascribed to the Earl of Warwick, who brought this territory under his dominion in the reign of Henry I.; and by others its erection is attributed to an earlier period. A town is supposed to have existed where the sands now are: to the south of them is a small village, which still retains the name of Southgate, and to the north is a farm preserving the original name of Norton, or North-town. The parish is situated in the south-western part of the county, and is separated from that of Penmaen by a small rivulet called Penarth Pill: the coast is lined with rocks which extend from this place to Pwll dû Point, forming the eastern side of Oxwich bay. The lands, with the exception of a very large portion which has been covered with sand and rendered incapable of tillage, are enclosed and cultivated. The surrounding scenery is of rugged and dreary character; and the views, though combining some romantic features, derive their principal interest from the contiguity of the Bristol channel. Kilvrough House, the seat of Thomas Penrice, Esq., is a handsome mansion: the grounds are now undergoing considerable improvement, and are being laid out with great taste and judgment, and, when the present alterations and improvements are completed, will form an interesting feature in the scenery of the place. Mr. Penrice has built a respectable and commodious house of entertainment, called the Gower Inn, for the accommodation of tourists, or persons on business, who, previously to its erection, were deterred from visiting this place, or the neighbouring country. The parish abounds with limestone of excellent quality, and extensive quarries have been opened, much of the produce of which is shipped to the counties of Cornwall and Devon. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £3. 16. 8., endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Warden and Fellows of All Souls' College, Oxford, with whom Mr. Penrice is now in treaty for an exchange, in the event of obtaining which it is the intention of that gentleman to erect a parsonage-house, and to appoint a resident incumbent. The present church, dedicated to St. Mary, was erected about two centuries ago; it occupies a situation on the summit of a hill, about half a mile from that of the more ancient structure. There is a place of worship for Welsh Calvinistic Methodists, erected by the late Lady Barham. A school-room has been built by Mr. Penrice, in which poor children of the parish are gratuitously instructed, principally at his expense. The remains of the ancient castle occupy a site a few hundred yards above the mouth of the Pennarth Pill, and consist principally of the gateway entrance, which is nearly perfect, and in a good style of architecture: they are surrounded with sand hills of considerable elevation, and present a very singular appearance. In the limestone rocks along the southern boundary of the parish are two remarkable caverns, in which have been found bones of animals of various kinds: one of these, called Bacon's Hole, is inaccessible from the sea at any state of the tide, and is entered only by a steep narrow path from the summit of the cliff. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £70. 11.

PENPONT (PEN-PONT), a hamlet in the parish of LLANSPYTHID, hundred of DEVYNOC, county of BRECKNOCK, 5 miles (W. by N.) from Brecknock, containing 150 inhabitants. This place, which is sometimes called Capel Bettws, though more generally known under the name of Penpont, is pleasantly situated on the river Usk, near the influx of the Camlais, and on the road from London through Brecknock to Milford. The surrounding scenery is richly diversified and highly picturesque, and the views from the higher grounds, though partially obstructed by the intervention of luxuriantly wooded hills, embrace many objects of pleasing character, and features of romantic beauty. Penpont, the seat of Parry Williams, Esq., is a handsome and substantially built mansion, recently modernized, and beautifully situated in extensive park-like grounds, comprehending a rich variety of finely varied scenery: the grounds, which are tastefully laid out, are enlivened by the windings of the river Usk, on the bank of which a beautiful walk has been constructed, leading through them to Abercamlais: the margin of the river is finely shaded by lofty oaks throughout the whole of this walk, and its waters, rolling over their rocky bed beneath, give to the whole a highly picturesque appearance. The grounds are almost surrounded by hills richly clothed with wood to their very summits; and within them the chapel of Penpont, otherwise called Capel Bettws, with its fine ample cemetery, forms a strikingly interesting object. In the house is preserved a portrait of Queen Anne Boleyn, second wife of Henry VIII., and mother of Queen Elizabeth, from whose family, of French origin, that of Williams is descended. Abercamlais, the seat of the Rev. John Williams, of the same family, and canon of St. David's, is also a good family mansion of more ancient appearance, situated in grounds which, though pleasingly disposed, are not distinguished by any strikingly picturesque scenery. Aberbrân, formerly the seat of another branch of this family, has been converted into a farm-house. All these houses are situated on the south bank of the Usk, within a mile of each other; and there is a bridge over the river nearly adjacent to each. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the parishioners residing within the hamlet. The chapel is a very small but neat edifice, with a cupola at the west end, pleasantly situated in the grounds of Penpont, close to the turnpike road, in an extensive cemetery enclosed within a ring fence, and surrounded with some venerable yews of luxuriant growth, intermixed with other trees: being much dilapidated, it was rebuilt about forty years since, and its general appearance greatly improved, at the sole expense of the late Mr. Philip Williams: here is the place of interment for the family of Williams. On a hill called the Gaer are some remains of an ancient British encampment. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £127. 4.

PENRHÔS (PEN-RHÔS), a parish in the hundred of GAFLOGION, Lley Division of the county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (W. S. W.) from Pwllheli, containing 112 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the western shore of Cardigan bay, is but of very moderate extent, comprising only a small portion of arable and pasture land, with some common: in many parts of it the soil is poor and sandy, and a considerable portion of the land will scarcely repay the labour and expense of cultivation. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Abereirch, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Cynwyl, is a very small edifice, with a thatched roof. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £29. 1.

PENRHÔS-LLIGWY, a parish in the hundred of TWRCelyn, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (E. N. E.) from Llanerchymedd, containing 557 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated near the shore of the Irish sea, is of very considerable extent, and is principally distinguished for the fine quarries of Mona marble with which it abounds, and in the procuring of which several of its inhabitants find constant employment. A small creek running up from Dulas bay affords every facility for conveying their produce to the shipping-place there, from which great quantities are sent to London and Liverpool. At a short distance from the mouth of the bay, which forms a very commodious harbour, is a small island called Ynys Gadarn, a lofty rock of marble, on which is placed an occasional light to direct mariners in the navigation of these dangerous coasts, and to point out an object which has often proved fatal to those who were unacquainted with this part of the shore. A few of the inhabitants are also employed in carding and spinning wool, of which a small manufactory is carried on in the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £800 royal bounty, and £500 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Lord Boston. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a neat modern structure. In the churchyard are two very ancient sepulchral stones, with inscriptions in very rude and antique characters, of which one is noticed by the author of the "Mona Antiqua Restaurata," as covering the grave of Mechell, or Macutus, grandson of one of the lords of Gloucester, Bishop of St. Maloes, and founder of the church of Llanvechell, in this county, who was massacred at Stonehege. Owen Lloyd, Esq., of London, in 1665, bequeathed a farm in the parochial chapelry of Iscoed, near Wrexham, directing the income to be applied to the apprenticing of poor boys of this parish to some trade or calling in London: the same gentleman left also £400 to be laid out in the purchase of land for the endowment of two exhibitions in the University of Oxford, for one boy, a native of this parish, and one a native of any part of the Isle of Anglesey. The rental of the farm is now £70 per annum, which is applied to the apprenticing of four boys of this parish: the exhibitors are appointed by Mr. Meyrick, of Bôdorgan. There are also some small charitable donations and bequests for distribution among the poor. Lligwy, in this parish, the ancient seat of the family of Llwyd, and now the property of Lord Boston, has been a venerable mansion, celebrated for the extensive woods surrounding it, of which at present there are but very small remains, the woodlands being now covered only with small brushwood and brambles, and the mansion almost in ruins. On the same estate are some remains of an ancient chapel, situated on an eminence overlooking the bay of Llŷs Dulas: the architecture, which is of the very rudest kind, bears testimony to its great antiquity: it is said to have been a private chapel belonging to the family mansion. On digging out a fox which had taken shelter in the ruins of this building, a large square vault was discovered, containing several human skeletons, which, on exposure to the air, crumbled into dust; and, on searching farther into the interior of the building, the ground which it enclosed was found to consist of a large mass of human bones, several feet in depth, and protected only by a covering of plaster, which formed the floor of the chapel. About a quarter of a mile to the south of these ruins is a very large cromlech, said to be the largest in the island: the table stone is nearly eighteen feet in length and sixteen feet in breadth, and is supported on five low upright stones, having one end resting upon a rock: this relic of antiquity is called by the country people Arthur's Quoit. Lewis Morris, an eminent antiquary, poet, and man of science, was born in this parish, in 1702: he was employed by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty to survey the coast of Wales, which work was completed and printed in 1748; he also left a work which he called "Celtic Remains," still unpublished, with an immense number of manuscripts, of which eighty volumes are deposited in the library of the Welsh charity school in Gray's Inn Lane, London. Richard Morris, his brother, distinguished himself as a Welsh critic and poet of considerable talent: he spent the greatest part of his life as first clerk in the Navy Office, during which time he superintended the printing of two valuable editions of the Welsh Bible. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £161. 4.

PENRICE, or PEN-RHÛS, a parish in the hundred of SWANSEA, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 13 miles (W. S. W.) from Swansea, containing 362 inhabitants. This place is said to have derived its name, signifying "the head of RhÛs," from the circumstance of RhÛs ab Caradoc ab Iestyn having been defeated and slain here, in defending his territories from the aggression of a party of Norman invaders. According to other authorities, the place is said to have obtained its name from the family of Penrice, who accompanied William the Conqueror into England, and afterwards obtained a settlement in Gower, in the reign of Edward I. The ancient castle, of which there are still some remains, is supposed to have been originally one of the fortresses raised by the Earl of Warwick, for the defence of the territory of Gower, which he had subjected to his authority, and to have been conveyed, together with the lordship, by marriage with Isabel, daughter and heiress of Sir John Penrice, to Sir Hugh Mansel, in the reign of Henry V. The property remained in the possession of this family till the year 1750, when, in default of heirs male, it passed to the second son of Mary, youngest daughter of Sir Thomas, afterwards Lord Mansel, who had been married to John Ivery Talbot, Esq., of Laycock Abbey, in the county of Wilts. The parish is situated on the western shore of Oxwich bay, in the Bristol channel, and comprises a moderate portion of arable and pasture land, the latter of which has been for the greater part recovered from the sea. The village is neatly built and of prepossessing appearance; the surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, and enriched with wood; and the views over the bay and the surrounding country are not destitute of interest. Near the remains of the ancient castle stands the modern villa called Penrice Castle, the seat of the family of Talbot: the mansion, which is a handsome edifice, was erected by the late Mr. Talbot, with stone brought from the quarries of Margam; and the grounds, which are laid out with great taste, and ornamented with a large artificial sheet of water, well stocked with fish, comprehend a variety of pleasing scenery. At the distance of about half a mile from the house is Oxwich marsh, an extensive tract, partly in the parish of Penrice, and partly in those of Oxwich and Nicholaston adjoining: it was formerly overflowed by the sea at high water, but was recovered by means of an embankment, constructed at the expense and under the superintendence of Mr. Talbot: it was also drained by a broad ditch cut on the north side, which empties itself by flood gates into a rivulet or pill communicating with the sea. This tract, which is more than two hundred acres in extent, affords excellent pasturage for cattle and horses, but the sheep that feed in it are now invariably subject to the rot, from which they were always free previously to the exclusion of the sea water. A market was formerly held here, and there are remains of the ancient market-place in the present village: fairs are still held on May 17th, June 20th, July 17th, and September 17th. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of C. R. M. Talbot, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Andrew, and situated on the summit of a hill, is an ancient structure with a lofty tower, which, being partly mantled with ivy, is both a conspicuous and picturesque object, as seen from the sea, and from the grounds of Penrice castle. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists at Horton. Sarah Bennet, in 1735, bequeathed £15 to the poor of the parish. The remains of Penrice castle occupy the summit of a high rock commanding Oxwich bay, and from its ruins it appears to have been of great strength and magnificence. Near the village are vestiges of an ancient intrenchment; and at a short distance is an old house, called the Sanctuary, which is said to have belonged to the manor of Millwood, or St. John's, the property of the knights of St. John of Jerusalem. Several ancient Saxon coins have recently been found here. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £61. 3.

PENRIETH (PEN-RHÛDD), a parish in the hundred of KILGERAN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (S. S. E.) from Cardigan, containing, with the chapelry of Castellan, 346 inhabitants. This parish is situated in a mountainous district in the north-eastern part of the county, and comprises a moderate portion of arable and pasture land, which, though light and poor, is enclosed and cultivated, and a considerable tract of unenclosed moor land, unsuceptible of profitable culture. The lofty mountain called Vrenni-Vawr, which, with only one exception, is the highest in the county, is comprehended within the limits of the parish. The surrounding scenery is bold and striking, but contains few features either of pleasing or picturesque beauty. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Cristiolus, is not remarkable for any architectural peculiarities. Within the parish is a chapel called Castellan, now in ruins, on account of which the incumbent receives one guinea per annum from Sir R. B. P. Philipps, of Picton Castle, Bart. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £91.

PENSTRYWED (PEN Y STROWED), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of LLANIDLOES, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (W.) from Newtown, containing 123 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the southern bank of the river Severn, and on the turnpike road leading from Newtown to Llandinam, is composed of a very moderate extent of arable and pasture land, of which by far the greater part is enclosed. The surface is boldly undulated, rising in some parts into eminences of considerable elevation: the soil, which is in general fertile, is in the lower grounds rich and productive, and the inhabitants are principally employed in agriculture. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied, combining many features of picturesque beauty; and the views from the higher grounds embrace a tract of fertile and richly cultivated country. The living is a discharged rectory, within the jurisdiction of the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £5. 0. 10., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. George, is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture, kept in decent repair, and appropriately fitted up. A portion of the Roman road leading from Caer-Sws to the Gaer, near Montgomery, may be traced, for some part of its course, in the grounds of Glân Havren, in this parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £43. 16.

PENTIR, formerly a parish of itself, now consolidated with that of Bangor, to which it has become a township, in the hundred of ISGORVAI, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (S.) from Bangor. The population is returned with Bangor. This place, which is situated among hills, after being repeatedly united to, and separated from, the parish of Bangor, was at length finally consolidated with it by the result of an action tried at Shrewsbury, in 1657, at the suit of Meredith v. Maurice. The living, formerly a vicarage not in charge, is now annexed to that of Bangor, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor: the tithes belong to the vicars choral of Bangor cathedral. A National school was established here in 1812, and is supported by subscription: about fifty children are gratuitously instructed, and, as there is no school-house, are taught in the church.

PENTRAETH (PEN-TRAETH), a parish in the hundred of TYNDAETHWY, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (N. W.) from Beaumaris, containing 938 inhabitants. The name of this place, signifying "the head or point of the sands," is derived from its situation at the head of a small bay of the Irish sea, called Traeth Côch, or "the Red Sands," and sometimes Red Wharf bay. The parish comprises a considerable tract of arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and cultivated, and a large portion of common, affording tolerable pasturage for sheep and young cattle. Several of the inhabitants are employed in the quarries of marble and limestone which are worked here on a considerable scale, and as seamen on board the vessels engaged in conveying the produce of these quarries to its destination: there is also a small fulling-mill in the village, affording employment to a few persons. The whole of the western side of the Traeth Côch, which is the place for shipping the marble and limestone that are found on this part of the island, is within the parish; and the sands on the shore of the bay, which are dry at low water, are so intermixed with sea-shells, as to form a substitute for lime, and to be employed as manure for many miles round, even constituting a considerable article of export to the neighbouring coasts. The village, which is very neat and of prepossessing appearance, is pleasantly situated in a narrow sheltered vale, on the turnpike road from Beaumaris to Llanerchymedd. Plâs Gwyn, the seat of the late Paul Panton, Esq., and now the residence of his brother, is a spacious and handsome mansion, surrounded with thriving woods and plantations, and containing a valuable library, in which are ninety-one volumes of manuscripts, chiefly in the Welsh language, which, during the life of the predecessor of the present occupier, was open to the inspection of the literary portion of the community. Fairs are held on May 5th, June 24th, and September 20th. The living forms part of the great rectory of Llanddvy-nan, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, held in commendam since the year 1701 by the Bishops of Bangor, who appoint a curate to serve both churches. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a small but neat edifice, and was put into a complete state of repair in 1821: it contains some good monuments to the memory of deceased members of the families of Plâs Gwyn and Tre-vrŷ, and is one of the only two churches in the island noticed by the learned Grose, in his Antiquities of Great Britain. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Richard Jones, in 1715, bequeathed a tenement called Gors-lâs, in this parish, the rental of which he directed to be divided in equal portions among the poor of Pentraeth and Llansadwrn; and Dr. John Jones, Dean of Bangor, in 1719, gave £100 to the rector, in trust for teaching ten poor children to read Welsh. Mrs. Anne Williams charged the estate of Plâs Gwyn with the payment of £50, the interest of which, together with the rental of a tenement in Holyhead, an annual payment in money from Tan y Lôn, £28 per annum arising from a mortgage on a tenement called Pen y Lôn, and the bequest of Richard Jones, has been from some unknown cause either totally withheld, or diverted from its proper object. There are also various other charitable donations and bequests, of which several are by unknown benefactors, for distribution among the necessitous poor of the parish. Dr. John Jones, Dean of Bangor, who bequeathed many extensive benefactions to various parishes, principally for educating poor children, was born at Plâs Gwyn, in this parish: he left his valuable library to the cathedral church of Bangor. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £261. 8.

PENTRE-HOBYN, a township in the parish of HAWARDEN, hundred of MOLD, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 1½ mile (S.) from Hawarden, containing 931 inhabitants, the population having increased upwards of one-fifth since the census of 1821. It comprises what may be considered the southern suburbs of the town of Hawarden, and is chiefly noted for its manufacture of fire-bricks, tiles, coarse earthenware, &c., of which large quantities are exported: the clay for the purpose is procured in the immediate neighbourhood. A part of the Warren mountain, in this township, was enclosed by an act of parliament in 1798. Pentre Hobyn House is a fine old mansion, erected in 1540.

PENTRE-VOELAS, a parochial chapelry in the hundred of ISALED, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, on the road from London to Holyhead and Dublin, 14 miles (S. W.) from Denbigh, containing 616 inhabitants. This chapelry comprises a portion of the most sterile moorlands of the county: three houses only constitute the village, at which a post-office has been established, and fairs are held on March 18th, May 12th, August 14th, and November 20th. An excellent road has recently been constructed from this place to Denbigh, across the mountains, which is intended to be continued to Festinog, thus forming a direct line of communication between the Vale of Clwyd and the slate quarries of Merionethshire and Carnarvonshire. The female inhabitants are chiefly employed in the spinning of woollen yarn, and the knitting of stockings, and the males in attendance upon their herds and flocks. At the extremity of the chapelry stands a small house, built in a curious style by C. W. G. Wynne, Esq., for a family residence, and called Lima. The living is a perpetual curacy, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese, of St. Asaph, endowed with £300 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of C. W. G. Wynne, Esq. The chapel is a small edifice, very much dilapidated. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic Methodists. Several small bequests have been made for the benefit of the poor by different members of the family of Wynne, the produce of which is distributed among them on St. Thomas' day. Within a short distance of the chapel is an extensive earth-work, once the site of Castell Côch, a fortress which was taken and destroyed by Llewelyn the Great; and in a plantation near the ruins of Voelas Hall stands a lofty columnar stone, bearing an inscription in Latin and Welsh, supposed to have been erected over the grave of Llewelyn ab Sytsylt, Prince of Wales, who was slain in the year 1021. There is a mineral spring within this chapelry, strongly impregnated with iron. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £255. 17.

PENTRËV-CWN a hamlet in that part of the parish of LLANDILO-VAWR which is in the hundred of ISCENNEN, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. S. W.) from Llandilo-Vawr, containing 206 inhabitants. It is situated in the valley of the Towy, and on the left bank of that river, immediately opposite to Dynevor Castle, and contains several agreeable residences. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £131. 17.

PENTYRCH, a parish in the hundred of MISKIN, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (N. W. by W.) from Cardiff, containing 926 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the western bank of the river Tâf, here crossed by an iron bridge, the passengers over which are subject to a toll, is divided into Garth and Castle hamlets, which do not, however, maintain their poor separately. Messrs. Richard Blakemore and Co., of the Melin Gruffydd Works, two miles southward, have also extensive works here: at the upper works is a blast furnace, and pig iron and finers' metal are there manufactured; these are rolled into charcoal bar iron at the lower works, the metal thus completed in which is conveyed by a tram-road to the Melin Gruffydd works, for the manufacture of tin and sheet iron: the number of persons employed, including colliers and miners, is about one hundred and seventy. In one part of the parish the iron-ore is found in parallel strata; in another, in patches, indiscriminately blended with limestone: there is also an abundance of good coal, which is actively worked. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £8. 3.  $1\frac{1}{2}$ ., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Archdeacon and Chapter of Llandaf. The church is dedicated to St. Cadocus. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic Methodists. A school is about to be established by subscription among the principal landed proprietors. Mary Matthew, in 1729, gave by will the sum of £300, for the benefit of the poor. An old mansion in this parish, called "Castell y Mynach," now the property of Lord Dynevor, and occupied by a farmer, was formerly a religious house, but nothing is known of its history. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £355. 17.

PEN Y BONT, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES. —See LLANBADARN-VAWR.

PETERSTON super ELY, a parish in the hundred of DINAS-POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (W.) from Cardiff, containing 192 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Peter, and its distinguishing adjunct from its situation on the bank of the river Ely, lies in the south-eastern part of the county, and comprises a moderate portion of arable and pasture land, which is in a good state of cultivation. Limestone is found in most parts of the parish, and the procuring of it affords employment to a portion of the inhabitants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £7. 12.  $8\frac{1}{2}$ ., and in the patronage of Sir T. D. Aubrey. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, is not distinguished by any architectural details. A parochial school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children, and a Sunday school, are supported principally by subscription. There are in this parish the remains of an ancient castle, which has been long in ruins; but nothing satisfactory is known either of its original foundation or of its history. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £125. 16.

PETERSTON super MONTEM, a chapelry in the parish of COYCHURCH, hundred of NEWCASTLE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (N. E. by E.) from Bridgend, containing 134 inhabitants. It is in Welsh called Llanbedr ar Vynydd, "the church of St. Peter on the mountain," and is situated on the confines of the hundreds of Ogmere and Cowbridge, at some distance from the mother church. It occupies the southern declivity of the mountain of Mynydd y Rhiw, and the inhabitants are exclusively engaged in agriculture. The river Ely partly bounds it on the north. The chapel is dedicated to St. Peter: attached to it is a Welsh Sunday school. A sum of £15 has been left to the poor of this chapelry; besides which, twenty-five shillings per annum are distributed among those not receiving parochial relief. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £66. 14.

PETROX (ST.), a parish in the hundred of CASTLE-MARTIN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (S. W.) from Pembroke, containing 77 inhabitants. This parish, which is also called Llan Pedrog, derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Pedrog, a British saint, who flourished about the commencement of the seventh century. It comprises but a very moderate tract of arable and pasture land, and is chiefly distinguished for the salubrity of the air, and the longevity of its inhabitants: the surface is pleasingly varied, and the soil fertile. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £7. 3. 9., and in the patronage of Earl Cawdor. The church, dedicated to St. Pedrog, is a neat edifice, with a handsome square tower, and is situated on an eminence commanding a pleasing view over the adjacent country. Attached to the living is a comfortable glebe-house, pleasantly situated and in good repair, with a moderate portion of land. The poor children of this parish have the privilege of gratuitous instruction in the parochial school at Cheriton. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £58. 15.

PICKHILL, a township in that part of the parish of BANGOR-ISCOED which is in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles (E. S. E.) from Wrexham, containing 175 inhabitants. It is situated on the western bank of the Dee, and has a few handsome residences overlooking that river, among which Pickhill Hall is the most conspicuous. There are benefactions amounting to £6. 13. 4. per annum, for teaching poor children. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £126. 4.

PILLITH (PWLL-LLAITH), a parish in the hundred of KEVENLEECE, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES,  $3\frac{3}{4}$  miles (S. W.) from Knighton, containing 75 inhabitants. This place is distinguished as the scene of a memorable engagement which took place between the army of Owain Glyndwr and the forces under the command of Sir Edward Mortimer, in which the latter was taken prisoner, with the loss of eleven hundred of his men. This battle, which is noticed by Shakspeare in his play of Henry IV., was fought on the 22d of June, 1402, on a hilly common, about half a mile to the north of the church. The parish is situated on the river Lug, and extends for about three miles in length, and one mile and a half in breadth: the greater portion of the land is enclosed, and in a tolerable state of cultivation; the surface is boldly undulated; and the soil, especially in the lower grounds, is fertile and productive: in many parts of the parish is dug peat of excellent quality. The living is a vicarage not in charge, annexed to that of Llangunllo, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is an ancient structure, consisting only of a nave and chancel, and not remarkable for any architectural details. The poor children of this parish are entitled to gratuitous instruction in the school founded at Whitton, by Lady Child, of this parish, who endowed it with lands producing more than £100 per annum, and under the provisions of whose will one child of this parish is annually apprenticed. On a common in the northern part of the parish are a few scattered houses, forming a place called Hên dre'r Garreg, or "the old town of the rock." In the churchyard is a well, the water of which is said to be peculiarly efficacious in the cure of all diseases of the eye. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £51. 12.

PIPTON, a hamlet in that part of the parish of GLÂSBURY which is in the hundred of TALGARTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. W.) from Hay, containing 140 inhabitants. This hamlet is situated on the south bank of the Wye, and between that river and the Llynvi. The road from Hay to Builth passes through it, and the surrounding country is fertile and pleasing. Here was formerly a chapel of ease to the mother church of Glâsbury, now demolished. A small benefaction of £1 per annum was left for the use of the poor, in 1671, by Mrs. Sybil Williams, of Trêvithel, in the adjacent parish of Bronllys. A separate assessment is made for the maintenance of the poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £84. 11.

PISTILL (PISTYLL), a parish in the hundred of DINLLAEN, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 7 miles (N. by W.) from Pwllheli, containing 528 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the shore of Carnarvon bay, and comprises a small mountainous district, the entire surface of which is dreary, rugged, and barren; and the scenery derives the little interest it possesses from the vicinity of the bay. There is no village, the houses being entirely scattered. Near the church is a modern farm-house, built upon the site of an ancient mansion: the proprietor of this farm, comprising two hundred acres of land, pays only one shilling modus for tithes, in consideration of the smallness of which charge he is compelled to provide bread and cheese, with good ale, or mead, for every person who shall have crossed the pass leading through the mountains of Yr Eivl, on their way to the market town of Nevin. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Edern, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor. The church, in which divine service is performed only on every third Sunday, is a small edifice, situated under a high rock, and upon the verge of a precipice overlooking the sea. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists: the former is situated at a place called Llithvaen, and the latter, to which a school is attached, stands near the church. To the east of the church is a small vale, called Nant Gwrtheirn, or "the Vale of Vortigern," to which that prince is said to have retreated for shelter from his infuriated subjects, and where he built a castle, which is said to have been destroyed by lightning. This narrow vale is situated between Craig y Llan and Yr Eivl, and is accessible only by sea; the sides are bounded by barren and rugged rocks, on which not a blade of vegetation is seen. At one extremity rises the loftiest peak of Yr Eivl, and the only opening is towards the sea, by which it is bounded on the north: the sole agricultural produce of this vale is oats. Near the shore is a small verdant mound, said to have been the site of Vortigern's castle; and near it was formerly a tumulus, called Bedd Gwrtheirn, or "Vortigern's Grave," in which was found a stone coffin, containing human bones. No traces of these relics are now visible, but the spot is still pointed out where that unfortunate prince, who met his death in this retired spot, in 464, was interred. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £119. 15.

PONTVAEN (PONT-VAEN), a parish in the hundred of KEMMES, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (S. E.) from Fishguard, containing 61 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the turnpike road leading from Haverfordwest to Newport, has a diversified surface, enlivened by the river Gwayn, which runs through it. Pontvaen House, formerly the residence of the Laugharnes, and now by purchase, together with the estate, including the whole of the parish, the property of Henry Rees, Esq., is a handsome mansion, pleasantly situated, and surrounded with thriving plantations. The neighbourhood is supposed to afford some of the best grouse-shooting in the county. The soil is in general fertile: the substratum is slate, which however has not yet been worked. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £3. 6. 8., endowed with £1200 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Henry Rees, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Bernard, is not remarkable for any architectural details of importance. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £24. 15.

PORT-DINORWIG, a small port, in the parish of LLANVAIRISGAER, hundred of ISGORVAI, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. N. E.) from Carnarvon: the population is returned with the parish. This place, anciently called "Aber Pwll," is situated on the Menai strait, and has a small and commodious harbour, accessible at high water to vessels of one hundred tons' burden. It forms a convenient shipping-place for the produce of the slate mines in the parish of Llandeiniolen, from which a rail-road, seven miles in length, extending from the quarries to this place, was constructed in 1824, for the conveyance of the slates, of which not less than twenty thousand tons are annually shipped at this port. The harbour, which has been recently enlarged, is capable of accommodating thirty vessels, which may lie here in safety while waiting for their freight, and the quay has been greatly improved.

PORT-EYNON (PORTH-EINION), a parish in the hundred of SWANSEA, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 15 miles (W. S. W.) from Swansea, containing 368 inhabitants. It is situated on the Bristol channel, and is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation: the village, which occupies a pleasant situation on the west, forms a pleasing feature in the picturesque scenery with which the environs abound. There is an extensive oyster fishery on the coast, which, with the exportation of its produce, affords a lucrative employment during the season to a large proportion of the inhabitants. There are from fifteen to twenty vessels, varying in burden from thirty to sixty tons, engaged in this and the limestone trade, the oysters, when obtained in sufficient quantity, being shipped off to Bristol. The parish abounds with limestone, which is procured in large quantities for exportation, and also for the supply of the neighbouring districts. On that which is exported a toll of two-pence per ton, called "cliffage," is paid to the lord of the manor, and frequently amounts to £40 per month. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £9. 5. 10., and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church is dedicated to St. Cadocus. Mr. John Clement, in 1784, bequeathed the sum of £14. 9. 6., directing the interest to be laid out in bread for distribution among the poor of this parish not receiving parochial relief. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £62. 13.

PORTHKERRY (PORTH-CERI), a parish in the hundred of DINAS-POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (S. E.) from Cowbridge, containing 109 inhabitants. This place derives its name, signifying the port of Ceri, from its situation on a small harbour of the Bristol channel, which is entered by vessels of inconsiderable burden, for the purpose of shipping the limestone which is quarried in the neighbourhood. Ceri, from whom the harbour received its name, was the great grandfather of the celebrated Caradog, or Carac-tacus; but in what respect that chieftain was connected with this place does not appear. The manor formed part of the allotment of Sir John St. John, of Fommon castle, one of Fitz-Hamon's knights, and, after passing through various hands, ultimately came into the possession of the late Sir Samuel Romilly, whose heirs are the present proprietors. The parish comprises but a very small tract of land, the whole of which is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £7. 8.  $1\frac{1}{2}$ ., and in the patronage of the heirs of the late Sir Samuel Romilly. The church, dedicated to St. Curig, is not remarkable for any architectural details; but in the churchyard is a handsome cross, in tolerably good preservation. There is a small charitable bequest to the poor of this parish by an unknown benefactor. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £63. 16.

PORT-PENRHYN, a small sea-port in the parish of LLANDEGAI, hundred of LLÊCHWEDD UCHÂV, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (E.) from Bangor. The population is returned with the parish. This place, which is of recent origin, owes its existence to the late Lord Penrhyn, by whom it was selected, as the shipping-place for the slates from his very extensive quarries in the vale of Nantfrancon, in this parish. It is very conveniently situated for that purpose on the Menai strait, closely adjoining the city of Bangor. About the year 1790, his lordship constructed a commodious wharf at the mouth of the river Cegin, which here falls into the strait, and in proportion to the extension and increased production of the quarries have been the subsequent improvements of this port. Extensive quays, accessible at all states of the tide to vessels of considerable tonnage, and additional wharfs, have been constructed; several sluices have been made; and spacious warehouses for depositing the produce of the quarries have been erected. A railway, six miles in length, has been formed from the quarries to the port, and every possible accommodation has been provided for facilitating the business here transacted. The only article shipped is the slate, of which immense quantities are sent coast-wise, and several cargoes of roofing slates are annually exported to America. The business transacted at this port affords constant employment to more than two hundred men, making, with the number engaged in the quarries, nearly one thousand seven hundred persons employed in these very extensive and important works. Port Penrhyn, for representative purposes, is included within the new limits of the city of Bangor.

PORTSEYBORVAWR, (PORTH SCYBOR, or YS-GUBOR, VAWR), a joint hamlet with Kitploith, in the parish of LLANDEVEYLOG, hundred of KIDWELLY, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (S.) from Carmarthen. The population is returned with Kitploith. It is situated on the left bank of the river Towy, along which there is a causeway to the town of Carmarthen. Several respectable residences are observable on the banks of the river, as well as on those of the river Pibwr, which flows through this place to its junction with the Towy. Over a chasm through which this stream takes its course is a remarkable bridge, on the road from Carmarthen to Llandarog. A Roman road from Kidwelly to Carmarthen passed through this hamlet.

PREES-UCHÂ, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES.—See TRÊV-BRÛS.

PRENDERGAST, a parish in the hundred of DUNGLEDY, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, adjoining to and comprising part of the borough of Haverfordwest, and containing 1105 inhabitants. This place derives its appellation from an ancient family of the same name, to whom the whole parish formerly belonged, and of whose mansion some remains may still be traced. The last member of that family who enjoyed this property was Maurice de Prendergast, who accompanied Strongbow, Earl of Clare, into Ireland, in which kingdom he finally settled. The property afterwards came into the possession of the Stepneys, who resided here till their removal into the county of Carmarthen, when the ancient seat, being deserted, soon fell into decay. The parish is situated between the rivers Hiog and Cledy, and, near its south-western extremity, is connected with the town of Haverfordwest by a bridge across the latter, from which the village extends chiefly along the road to Cardigan, with a branch street southward; the whole forming an extensive and important suburb of Haverfordwest. A small tract at this angle of the parish, comprising a part of the village lying nearest to the town, is included within the ancient limits of the town and county of the town of Haverfordwest, the electoral boundaries of which are extended by the 2nd and 3rd of William IV., c. 64., so as to include the whole village, together with the south-western portion of the parish, which contains about fifty houses of value sufficient to qualify the tenants as voters for the borough. The petty sessions for the hundred are held in the village. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £9. 14. 9., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. David, is an ancient and venerable structure, in the early style of English architecture, and in good repair. There is a place of worship for Primitive Methodists. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £186. 19.

PRESTATYN, a joint township with Nant, in the parish of MELIDEN, hundred of PRESTATYN, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (N.N.E.) from St. Asaph. The population is returned with the parish. This place, from which the hundred derives its name, was anciently a lordship, and had a castle, which is supposed to have been erected at a very early period by the native British inhabitants of the district. This fortress was wrested from its ancient owners, in the reign of Henry II., by the English, who had possession of it in the year 1167, when it was destroyed by Owain Gwynedd, Cadwaladr, and Rhÿs, Prince of South Wales, who then reduced the whole of Tegengle to the power of Owain. The lordship was granted by Richard I. to Robert Banaster, who kept possession of it for nearly four years, and built a town which was afterwards destroyed by Owain Gwynedd. In the seventh of Edward I. Robert de Crevecoeur laid claim to it, in right of his ancestor Banaster, and, on an inquisition taking place, it was determined in his favour. From the Crevecoeurs the lordship passed by marriage to the Conways of Bôd- ryddan, and on the division of the family estates, after the death of Sir John Conway, it fell, in right of his mother, to the Rev. Richard Williams, of Vron, who disposed of it to his brother-in-law, Richard Wilding, Esq. Of the ancient castle there are still some small vestiges, consisting of portions of the foundation, on an elevated spot called Plas Prestatyn, in a meadow below the mill; and likewise traces of the fosse by which it was surrounded, at some distance. The township is situated on the shore of the Irish sea, in a flat district, which is highly cultivated and richly productive of all kinds of grain, but more especially of excellent wheat, for the growth of which the soil is peculiarly favourable. From the shore, which is a fine sandy beach, extends for a distance of four miles, in a westerly direction, a sand-bank called Chester Bar, which is dry at low water; and other extensive banks are observable at a greater distance from the coast, projecting into the sea, and occupying the mouth of the æstuary of the Dee: at the distance of half a mile from the shore the water varies from one to two fathoms in depth.

PRESTEIGN, otherwise LLANANDRAS, a parish, partly in the hundred of WIGMORE, county of HEREFORD, and partly in the hundred and county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, in which latter it comprises the township of Presteign (including the market and assize town of that name), and the chapelry of Discoed, which separately support their own poor, 8 miles (E. N. E.) from New Radnor, and 152 (W. N. W.) from London; the whole parish contains 3282 inhabitants, there being in that part of it which is in the county of Radnor 1629, of which number, 1513 are in the township of Presteign, which includes the whole of the town, together with an extensive tract of land surrounding it on the east, south, and west. This place, of which the latter name is derived from the dedication of its church to St. Andrew, appears to have remained in obscurity till towards the close of the thirteenth century, and to have first risen into importance during the prelacy of David Martin, Bishop of St. David's, who was raised to that see in the year 1293. This prelate, who continued to preside over the see till 1328, was a munificent benefactor to it, having obtained for the inhabitants the privilege of holding a weekly market, which, according to Leland, was in his time celebrated for its corn, and frequented by the people of the cantrêv of Maelienydd. Either from its retired situation or its want of local importance, it appears to have been altogether unconnected with any of the military events that so often disturbed the internal tranquillity of the principality, or made the marches the scene of havoc and slaughter. During the parliamentary war in the reign of Charles I., that monarch, retreating before Cromwell, then in the neighbourhood of Hereford, appears from an entry in an old parish register to have passed two nights at the house of Nicholas Taylor, Esq., who lived in this parish, at a place called the Lower Heath, near what is now called "the King's Turning," probably from the circumstance of the king having turned thence over the hills to Newtown in Montgomeryshire, from which place he proceeded to Chester.

The town, which is now the chief town in the county of Radnor, is pleasantly situated in the midst of a fertile vale surrounded by hills, of which some are richly wooded, and is separated from that part of the parish which is in Herefordshire only by the small river Lug, which here forms a boundary between the two counties, and is crossed by an ancient bridge of three small arches. It consists of one principal thoroughfare, from which two smaller streets diverge nearly at right angles, and parallel with each other, in a direction towards the river. Though of an irregular form, it has an air of neatness and respectability superior to most of the towns in this part of the principality: the houses, though in general small, are well built and of neat appearance, and are interspersed with several of larger size, inhabited by respectable families of independent fortune, and professional individuals. The streets are partially paved, though not lighted; and the inhabitants are amply supplied with water by means of pumps and open wells. The surrounding scenery is finely varied, and in many points highly picturesque; and from the hills by which the vale is surrounded are some interesting and extensive views over the country adjacent. An eminence called Warden, a little to the west of the town, supposed to have been the site of an ancient castle, of which there are no remains, was presented to the inhabitants by the Earl of Oxford, and has been laid out in agreeable walks, forming a pleasant promenade, which is a favourite resort of the inhabitants: it commands a very delightful prospect, embracing a fine tract of highly cultivated country, embellished with pleasingly diversified scenery, and enlivened with numerous gentlemen's seats, among which Boultonbrook, the seat of Sir Harford Jones Brydges, Bart., an elegant mansion situated in beautifully disposed grounds, forms a conspicuous object. The river Lug is celebrated for its trout and graylings, which are taken here of superior quality. A woollen manufacture was formerly carried on, but it has been for some time abandoned, and the town has now no branch of manufacture: the trade is principally in malt, of which a great quantity is made, the soil in the neighbourhood being favourable to the growth of barley. Some trade is also carried on in timber, which is brought from the counties of Hereford and Radnor, and in coal, brought by land carriage from the Clee Hill in Shropshire, and also from Monmouthshire, by a railroad to Kington, in Herefordshire, and thence by land carriage to this town. A portion of traffic arises also from its situation on the turnpike roads leading from New Radnor to Leominster, and from Knighton to Kington; and the neighbourhood for five miles round is principally supplied with grocery, drapery, iron work, and shop goods in general, from this place, which has become a central dépôt for those articles of trade. The market is on Saturday: the principal fairs are now held annually on May 9th and October 13th, of which the former is also a statute fair for the hiring of servants; and there is a smaller fair on December 11th. A fair formerly held on the 20th of June has been superseded by a celebrated wake, called Warden Wake, now annually held on that day upon the eminence called Warden.

This place is a borough by prescription; and there is a crown manor, styled "the Lordship, Manor, and Borough of Presteign," comprising the township of Presteign and the chapelry of Discoed. It has a bailiff and two constables, the former appointed annually at the court leet of the crown, but exercising no magisterial authority. The township is divided into the four wards of High-street, St. David's-street, Broad-street, and Hereford-street, of which the two former and the two latter collect their poor's rates jointly, and the whole are united for the maintenance of the poor. The borough formerly claimed to be contributory to New Radnor, in the return of a member to parliament; but this claim of the inhabitants to exercise the elective franchise was rejected by the House of Commons, in 1690, on the assertion of the right, from which, according to the prevailing tradition among the inhabitants, they had been previously excluded, on refusing to contribute towards the expense of supporting their representative. But, under the recent act to amend the representation, the township of Presteign, and the chapelry of Discoed, comprehending all that part of the parish which is situated within the county of Radnor, together with a small tract of the Herefordshire portion of it, on the banks of the Lug, immediately opposite the town, of which it contains a small suburb, form a contributory borough with those of Kevenleece, Knighton, Cnwclas, and Rhaiadr, in returning one member to parliament for the borough of Radnor. There being no former freemen, the right of election is vested in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act directs: the limits of the borough are minutely defined in the Appendix; the number of tenements of the above value, comprised within the Radnorshire portion of the borough, is one hundred and thirty-seven. In the 35th and 36th of Henry VIII. a statute was passed, ordaining that the county courts, which had been previously held alternately at New Radnor and at Rhaiadr, should be thereafter held alternately at New Radnor and at Presteign, in consequence of a sheriff having been resisted in the execution of his duty, and killed in a tumult at Rhaiadr; and it was subsequently arranged that the courts of assize should be held invariably at this place, where also the quarter sessions are held. The sheriff's courts are held here alternately with New Radnor. Presteign is likewise, by the 2nd and 3rd of William IV., c. 64, constituted a polling-place for the election of the county representative. The shire-hall, erected in 1829, at an expense of £ 5000, defrayed by the county, is a handsome and commodious edifice of brick and stone, with a stuccoed front: it consists of a centre and two wings, the former ornamented with four equidistant pilasters of the Tuscan order, supporting an entablature and cornice, and the latter having each a receding portico, supported by three Tuscan columns: the centre comprises the court for holding the assizes and sessions, which is conveniently arranged: the north wing contains an apartment for the grand jury, a withdrawing-room for the petty jury, offices for the clerk of the peace, and apartments for the housekeeper; and the south wing comprises a suite of apartments intended for the accommodation of the judges, consisting of two bedrooms, with dressing-rooms attached, a dining-room and a drawing-room, each thirty feet long, twenty feet wide, and sixteen feet in height. But the recent alteration in the Welsh judicature has rendered these preparations less necessary, as the judges seldom protract their stay in the town beyond two days, and the apartments, which have not been yet furnished, are not likely to be occupied for that purpose. The county gaol, including also the house of correction for the county, was built in 1820, at an expense of £3500: it is situated on the east side of the town, and comprises three wards for the classification of prisoners, and, including the apartments for debtors, contains thirty-five sleeping cells, four day-rooms, and four airing-yards: the prisoners sentenced to hard labour are employed in breaking stones, there being no tread-wheel at present in the prison: the whole is enclosed within a wall eighteen feet high, and the entrance is between two massive three-quarter columns, supporting an entablature.

The living is a rectory, with the chapelry of Discoed annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £20, and in the patronage of the Earl of Oxford. The impropriate tithes of this parish having been forfeited to the crown by the feoffees of the parish of St. Antholine, in the city of London, in the 15th of Charles I., in consequence of their purchasing impropriations for the purpose of maintaining "factious and seditious lectures," were granted by that monarch to the Rev. John Scull, B.D., rector of this parish, and to his successors for ever: this grant was revoked after the decapitation of that sovereign, but was restored by Charles II., in the first year of his reign. The church, dedicated to St. Andrew, is a spacious and handsome structure, partly in the decorated, and partly in the later style of English architecture, with a square western tower, strengthened with buttresses at the angles, and surmounted by a turret at one of them, and by pinnacles at the other three. The interior consists of a nave, chancel, and two aisles, the south aisle extending the whole length of the building, and forming a second chancel, which is claimed by the parishioners as their property: the nave is separated from the aisles by series of six pointed arches, resting upon octagonal pillars. The altar-piece is embellished with some fine tapestry, representing the entry of our Saviour into Jerusalem, the colours of which, though not vivid, harmonize well, and the whole is in a state of excellent preservation: above it is the following inscription, recording the name of the donor,—"Richard de Brampton Parva, in hac parochia, Arm., 1737." This was Richard Owen, who also gave two silver salvers, to hold the bread at the communion. There are four small galleries, and in that at the west end is a good organ, presented to the parish, in 1819, by the late Robert Edwards, of this town. In the chancel are some handsome monuments to the memory of several deceased members of the families of Owen, Price, and Davies. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists. The free grammar school was founded in the reign of Elizabeth, by John Beddowes, formerly a clothier of this town, who endowed it with some houses, and with seventy-seven acres of land, in the township of Presteign, now producing £150 per annum, and vested in eleven trustees: the present number of trustees is seven, who have power to fill up vacancies. There are also numerous charitable donations and bequests for the relief of the poor, and for various other purposes, of which the following are the principal: Nicholas Taylor, Sen., Esq., gave £30 for apprenticing one poor boy or girl of the parish, to which £20 was afterwards added by his son, who also bequeathed £30 to buy clothing for the poor; Ambrose Meredith, of Napleton, gave one-half of two parcels of land, and one cottage with a garden, for apprenticing children, and the other half to the poor generally; Sir Thomas Street, of Worcestershire, one of the judges on the circuit, gave £20, forfeited by William Whitcomb, high sheriff of Radnorshire, for his non-appearance at the assizes, towards apprenticing seven children; and Margaret Price, of Pillith, left £50 for apprenticing one poor boy, and ten pounds for clothing to be given to two poor people annually. Ellen Harris, of London, in 1630, bequeathed the yearly sum of £4, of which four marks were to be paid for four sermons, one mark to be distributed among the poor on the days those sermons were delivered, and one mark to the churchwardens of the parish for ever. John Matthews, of Clerkenwell, London, bequeathed £50 to be lent without interest for two years to five or six poor tradesmen of this parish, and £2. 12. per annum to be distributed in bread to the poor: he also bequeathed a fund for the distribution of six coats and six bibles to poor children. John Eccleston, Esq., of this town, gave £50 for the erection of some small houses, as rent-free residences for the poor. Edward Price, Esq., of Aylesbury, in the county of Bucks, bequeathed £50, now secured on the Radnorshire turnpike trust, the interest to be distributed in bread to the poor. Thomas Cornwall, Baron Burford, and lord of Stapleton and Lugharnest, gave several sums of money forfeited to him as lord of the manor, and amounting to £8. 12.; and Nicholas Scarlet, of this town, gave £2 per annum, to the poor. Littleton Powell, Esq., of Stannage, one of the six clerks in Chancery, gave a large silver flagon for holding the sacramental wine, weighing seventy-four ounces three drachms, and valued at £25, to the church; and Giles Whitehall, Esq., of the Moor, gave to the township of Presteign an engine with twelve leather buckets, for extinguishing fires in the town. Dr. Richard Lucas, master of the free grammar school at Abergavenny, and subsequently vicar of St. Stephen's, Coleman-street, London, and lecturer of St. Olave's, Southwark, a popular preacher of his time, was born in this town. A curious custom prevails here on Shrove-Tuesday, which is observed by one party pulling a rope upwards, and another downwards to the river, the successful party retaining the rope in token of victory; and it is popularly predicted that, if the party pulling the rope upwards prevails, grain will be cheap that year, but, if it goes down, it will be dear. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of the township of Presteign amounts to £422. 7., and of the chapelry of Discoed to £17. 7.

PRIESTHOLME ISLAND, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES.—See PENMON.

PRION, a joint township with Cliciedig, in the parish of LLANRHAIADR-IN-KINMERCH, hundred of ISALED, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (S. S. W.) from Denbigh. The population is included in the return for the parish. This township was formerly assessed with those of Cliciedig Isâv and Uchâv, for the joint maintenance of their poor, but now there is a general assessment for the parish. A river rises in the hilly part of it, from two sources, after the union of the waters from which it sinks under ground, and does not shew itself again, until it bursts forth in a copious stream from a limestone rock at the well of Fynnon St. Dyvnog, near the parish church.

PRISK (PRYSC), a joint township with Carvan, in the parish of LLANDEWY-BREVI, upper division of the hundred of PENARTH, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, containing, with Carvan, 149 inhabitants. These names signify a coppice on the ridge of an eminence, in allusion to the situation of the township. The population is exclusively agricultural. A separate assessment is made for the support of the poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £55. 17.

PRYSG (Y PRYSG), a joint parcel with Killey, in the parish of LLANGATTOCK, hundred of CRICKHOWEL, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{4}$  miles (S. W.) from Crickhowel. The population, which has increased nearly a fourth since the census of 1821, is included in the return for the parish. This place is situated on the right bank of the river Usk, and one of the roads from Abergavenny to Crickhowel passes through it. The Brecknock canal intersects it in a line parallel with the river, and the neighbourhood contains some pleasing residences, the principal of which is Dan y Park, to which was formerly attached an extensive demesne, now partly divided into cultivated enclosures. There are numerous limestone quarries, and much of their produce is burned into lime, which is conveyed by the Brecknock canal to various places along its banks. At the south-western extremity of this district, on the banks of the Ebbwy Vawr stream, which separates it from Monmouthshire, are situated the Beaufort iron-works, belonging to Messrs. Kendall, West, and Bevan, from which railways diverge across the mountains to the Gylvâch coal-pits and to the Brecknock canal.

PUNCHESTON, a parish in the hundred of KEMMES, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 12 miles (N. N. E.) from Haverfordwest, containing 326 inhabitants. This parish, which is also called "Castell Mael," probably from an ancient encampment, of which there are still some remains, comprises a considerable tract of arable and pasture land, the greater portion enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The surface is boldly undulated, in some parts rising into mountainous elevations; and the soil is various, but in the low grounds fertile and productive. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Rev. James Williams James. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is not remarkable for any architectural details. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic Methodists; and the Society of Friends had formerly a place of interment in this parish. The remains of the ancient encampment above noticed occupy the summit of a rocky eminence, inaccessible on one side by the precipitous steepness of the acclivity, and defended on the other sides by a deep intrenchment. The Rev.—Gambold, father of Bishop Gambold, and the compiler of a Welsh, Latin, and English Dictionary, was for some years rector of this parish. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £51. 13.

taining 174 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the south side of Milford Haven, and comprises a considerable tract of arable and pasture land, of which, with the exception of a comparatively small portion, the whole is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. Limestone abounds within its limits, and some of the inhabitants are employed in the quarries, which are worked on a moderate scale. A small creek of Milford Haven affords great facility for conveying their produce to its destination. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £9. 12. 11., and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a venerable structure, in the decorated style of English architecture, erected in the fourteenth century by Radulph Beneger, then rector of the parish, who was interred in the south aisle, where his effigy is placed in a recess, with the following inscription in old Norman characters;—Hic jacet Radulphus Beneger, Hujus ecclesie rector." In a tablet inserted in the wall there is also a complimentary tribute in Latin verse; and in the outer angle of the north transept is the inscription, also in Norman characters, "A.D. 1342, Erat ista Ecclesia constructa de novo, cum capella ista, per Radulphum Beneger, qui rexit ecclesiam per annos . . ." In the churchyard a skirmish took place in 1648, during the parliamentary war in the reign of Charles I., between the royalist and parliamentary forces. There is a place of worship for Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. John Meares, Esq., of Istington, in this parish, in 1763, charged his estates in Pembrokeshire with the payment of £12 per annum for the instruction of twelve poor boys of this and the adjoining parish of Rhôscrowther: the school-room, which had been previously built by that gentleman, is kept in repair by his successors, who, with the rector for the time being, have the nomination of the children. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £115. 15.

PWLLHELL, a borough, sea-port, and market town, in the parish of DENIO, hundred of GAFLOGION, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 20 miles (S. S. W.) from Carnarvon, and, through that town, 271 (W. N. W.) from London. The population, amounting to 2091, is returned as that of the parish of Denio, with the limits of which those of the ancient borough are co-extensive. This place derives its name, signifying literally the "Salt Pool," from the small bay on the eastern side of the great promontory of Lley, on the shore of which it is situated, and which forms the æstuary of several small streams, which pour their waters through it into the northern part of the wide and stormy bay of Cardigan. Edward the Black Prince granted this place, together with Nevin, to Nigel de Lohareyn, in consideration of his numerous services, particularly as a reward for his fidelity and valour at the battle of Poitiers; and by charter dated at Carnarvon, in the twelfth year after his accession to the principality of Wales, he incorporated the inhabitants, upon whom he conferred all the privileges of a free borough, with exemption from toll in England and Wales, and the right of a mercatorial guild, a market, and two annual fairs, stipulating that they should pay to Nigel no less than £40 per annum: all these privileges were subsequently confirmed by Edward III. The town is well built, and amply supplied with water, but badly paved and not lighted. The surrounding scenery comprehends many features of grandeur and of beauty; and the view from the town, embracing the whole extent of the Snowdon mountains, the Merionethshire hills, and Cardigan bay, is truly magnificent. The waste lands in this and the adjoining parishes were enclosed pursuant to an act of parliament obtained for that purpose in the 48th of George III., under the authority of which two embankments were constructed, one on each side of the town, at an expense of £10,000, by means of which three thousand acres of land have been recovered from the sea, and are now under cultivation. The situation of the town is well adapted for carrying on an extensive commerce with Liverpool, South Wales, and Dublin; but it has now only a small coasting trade. The harbour, which is entered by a high round rock, called Carreg yr Imbill, or "the rock of the Gimlet," and accessible to vessels of one hundred tons' burden at all states of the tide, has been in some degree injured by the embankments above noticed, and from neglect is nearly choked up. The commerce consists entirely in the importation of coal and of shop goods from Liverpool, for the supply of which to the surrounding country Pwllheli forms a great depôt, and is thus, though small, rendered a flourishing place: the port is a creek to that of Beaumaris. The market, which is on Wednesday, is well supplied with fish, poultry, eggs, butchers' meat, and all other kinds of provisions, which are here cheaper than in any other town on the coast of North Wales; and, there being no other market held near, it is resorted to even by persons living at the furthest extremity of the promontory of Llyn, a distance of twenty miles. Fairs are annually held on March 5th, May 13th, June 28th, August 19th, September 24th, and November 11th.

The government, by the charter of Edward the Black Prince, confirmed by Edward III., Henry IV., V., and VI., Edward IV., Richard III., Henry VII. and VIII., Edward VI., and by Mary and Elizabeth, is vested in a mayor, recorder, two bailiffs, and an indefinite number of burgesses, assisted by a town steward, a serjeant at mace, and other officers. The mayor, who holds his office for life, and the senior bailiff, who is chosen annually on the 29th of September, are elected by the burgesses at large, who also nominate the junior bailiff, and elect annually to all the other offices; but the nomination of the junior bailiff is subject to the approval of the mayor, who also appoints the recorder. This is one of the contributory boroughs which, with Carnarvon, return one member to parliament: the elective franchise was conferred in the 27th of Henry VIII. The right of election was formerly in the burgesses at large, one hundred in number, but is now vested in the resident burgesses only (of whom there are seventy-five within the borough and a distance of seven miles), if duly qualified according to the provisions of the act; and in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of at least ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act directs: the number of tenements of this value, within the limits of the borough, which have been altered by the late act, and are minutely detailed in the Appendix, is one hundred and fifteen. The freedom of the borough is inherited by all the sons of freemen, whether born in the borough or not, and is acquired by marriage with the daughter of a freeman, by servitude to a freeman whether resident in the borough or elsewhere, by a residence of twelve months within the borough (paying scot and lot), and by election at a borough court. The corporation have no magisterial power, the borough being entirely under the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, who hold petty sessions in the town. A court is held every alternate Saturday, at which the recorder and bailiffs preside, for the determination of all pleas and the recovery of debts under forty shillings. By the recent acts for amending the representation, Pwllheli has been constituted a polling-place for the election of the knight of the shire. The town-hall, erected in 1818, is a neat substantial edifice, the lower part of which is appropriated on the market days as shambles, and the upper part contains an excellent assembly-room, and a room in which the petty sessions are held. The parish church, which is situated about half a mile to the north of the town, being very small and much dilapidated, it is intended to erect in lieu of it a new church in the town, which will be parochial, though funerals will nevertheless continue to be solemnized at the old church of Denio. There are places of worship for Independents, Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, and Presbyterians. The Rev. Hugh Jones, in 1695, bequeathed to Griffith Vaughan £1000 in trust, to appropriate £200 of that sum to the erection of a school-house in such place in either of the counties of Anglesey, Carnarvon, or Merioneth, as he should think fit, and to vest the remaining £800 in the purchase of land for the endowment of a school for the gratuitous instruction of all poor boys of either of those counties. The school-house was built at Pwllheli; but the money, never having been vested in the purchase of land, still remains in the hands of his descendant, Lloyd Mostyn, Esq., who appoints the master, to whom he pays the interest of that sum as a salary: there are at present fifty-six boys in the school. The rent of some land in the parish, which was bequeathed to the poor, is annually distributed among them at Christmas.

PWLLYWRACH (PWLL Y WRACH), a hamlet in the parish and hundred of TALGARTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (S.E. by S.) from Talgarth, containing 187 inhabitants. This hamlet, the name of which signifies "the hag's pool," lies in a deep valley formed by the Talgarth mountain, on the east, and that of Mynydd Troed on the west, and at the source of the Rhiangoll stream, which afterwards pursues its course into the vale of Llanvihangel Cwm-dû.

PYLE, a joint parish with Kenwig, in the hundred of NEWCASTLE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 11½ miles (S.S.E.) from Neath, containing, exclusively of Kenwig, 475 inhabitants. It was originally a chapelry attached to the parish of Kenwig, but since the devastation of that town and the destruction of its church by an inundation of the sea, as noticed in the article thereon, the parishes have been united, the livings consolidated into one vicarage, and the chapel of Pyle has become the parochial church. The two places are nearly of equal extent. Through Pyle now runs the turnpike road from Cardiff to Swansea, which formerly passed through Kenwig, but was diverted from its original course after the devastation of the borough. The village, though small, has a neat and pleasing appearance: a handsome and capacious inn has been erected here by the late J. M. Talbot, Esq. Near the church, on the estate of C. R. M. Talbot, Esq., is a quarry of excellent building stone, from which that employed in the erection of the spacious mansion in Margam Park, belonging to Mr. Talbot, now in progress, is taken. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £4. 8. 11½., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. James the Apostle, is a handsome structure, appropriately fitted up for the accommodation of the parishioners. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. A parochial school for the gratuitous instruction of the poor is supported by subscription. Mr. Thomas Lougher, in 1747, bequeathed £50, and Mr. John Waters left £40, both which sums have been invested in the purchase of land producing £4. 10. per annum, which is distributed annually among the poor of this parish. Near the church is a spring called Collwyn Well, the water of which has been long celebrated for its medicinal properties. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £209. 2.

Q.

QUARTER-MAWR, a joint hamlet with Gwydre, in the parish of LLANTHOYSAINT, lower division of the hundred of PERVETH, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES. The population is returned with the parish. It lies on the borders of the Black Mountains, which separate Carmarthenshire from Brecknockshire. The poor are maintained by an assessment conjointly with Gwydre, the average annual expenditure amounting to £94. 17.

Radnor (NEW), or MAES-YVED, a borough and parish, having exclusive jurisdiction, and formerly of sufficient importance to have given its name to the county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (W. S. W.) from Presteign, and 157 (W. N. W.) from London, containing 472 inhabitants. Its Welsh name, signifying "the imbibing meadow," is derived from the circumstance of the little river Somergil sinking into the earth in its vicinity, and pursuing a subterraneous course for a considerable distance. Though at present little more than an inconsiderable village, it was anciently a place of some importance, and most probably owed its origin to the erection of a castle here by the Mortimers, for the protection of the territories they had acquired in this part of the principality. This castle, which was of considerable strength, occupied an eminence above the town, commanding the passage from the mountains into the open country; and, from its situation on the border, the town was fortified with walls having four strong gates, and surrounded by a deep moat. In 1188, Baldwin, archbishop of Canterbury, accompanied by Giraldus Cambrensis, on his mission to preach the crusades throughout Wales, commenced his labours at this place, to which he was attended by Ranulph de Glanville, justiciary of England, and where he was received by Rhys ab Gruffydd, Prince of South Wales, and several other Welsh chieftains; and at this town commences Giraldus' Itinerary. In the following year, Rhys ab Gruffydd, having made a formidable incursion into the English marches, assaulted and took possession of the castle, which he resolutely defended against Sir Roger Mortimer, who came to its relief with a considerable body of well-armed veteran forces. All the efforts of Sir Roger to retake the fortress proved unavailing; and the troops of Rhys, sallying from the castle, entered into close action with the English forces, whom they ultimately drove from the field, after an obstinate and sanguinary conflict. In 1217, King John, in resentment of Llewelyn ab Iorwerth's abandonment of his interests, laid siege to the castle, which he demolished; but it was soon afterwards rebuilt by the English, from whom it was taken by Llewelyn in 1231. It was besieged, in 1263, by the confederate forces of Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, Prince of North Wales, and the two sons of the celebrated Simon de Montfort, and, being taken, was burnt to the ground; but, though no further account of it occurs in the mean time, it was probably rebuilt, for its final destruction, together with the ruins of the town, is stated in the charter granted by Queen Elizabeth to have been effected by Owain Glyndwr, who, in 1401, having posted himself on Plinlimmon hill, thence despatched his forces on plundering excursions, during which they destroyed the abbey of Cwm Hir, in Radnorshire, and took the castle of Radnor, causing the whole garrison, to the number of sixty men, to be beheaded on the brink of the castle yard. By an act of the 27th of Henry VIII., New Radnor was constituted the shire town of the newly erected county of Radnor; and the assizes and quarter sessions were appointed to be held alternately here and at Rhaiadr; but, by subsequent acts of the 35th and 36th of the same reign, these courts were ordered to be held alternately here and at Presteign, to which latter place the assizes were subsequently wholly removed, and are still invariably held there. Leland, describing New Radnor in the reign of Henry VIII., states that the ruins of the four gates were then remaining in the walls; that the castle was in ruins, with the exception of part of the gate, which had been repaired; that there was an old church near the castle, then used as a chapel; and that not far from it was a new parish church, built by William Bacheffeld and Flory his wife. According to Speed's map, in 1610, the town appears to have had at that time three principal streets, extending parallel with each other, in a direction from east to west, and four smaller streets intersecting them at right angles, exclusively of four short streets leading from the upper street to the church and castle. Since that period, however, it has dwindled into an insignificant village. "In times past," says Camden, "it was firmly fenced with a Wall and Castle, but after that

Owen Glendwrwy (that notable Rebel) had burnt it, it began by little and little to decrease and grow to decay, tasting of the same fortune as the mother thereof did before (I mean Old Radnor), which in the Reign of King John Rhys ap Gryffyn did set on fire." Indeed, its sole importance depended upon its existence as a border fortress; when it ceased to be such, Kingston and Presteign soon surpassed it as market towns.

The present town is situated on the banks of the small river Somergil, near its descent from the mountains into the Vale of Radnor, and consists only of a few houses, built of a perishable slaty stone, and of very mean appearance: the names of some of its ancient streets are still preserved, though others no longer exist: vestiges of them, however, may still be traced among the gardens, but most of them have become merely foot-paths. With the exception of a few maltsters and handicraftsmen the entire population is engaged in agriculture. The market, formerly held on Tuesday, after several ineffectual attempts to revive it, has altogether fallen into disuse. Fairs are held annually on August 14th and October 28th and 29th, which latter is very numerously attended. This place was a borough by prescription till the reign of Elizabeth, who, in the 4th year of her reign, granted the inhabitants a charter of incorporation, with many privileges, an extensive manor, and an exclusive jurisdiction, extending over a district nearly thirty miles in circumference. Under this charter, confirmed and extended by one of George II., which not only recites it, but likewise mentions others "by divers lords of the marches," the government is vested in a bailiff, two aldermen, and twenty-five capital burgesses, assisted by a recorder, coroner, town-clerk, two chamberlains, two serjeants at mace, and other officers. The bailiff and aldermen are annually elected from the capital burgesses, by a majority of that body, on the Monday after the feast of the Holy Cross: the recorder, who holds his office for life, and all the other officers of the corporation, are also elected by the capital burgesses. The capital burgesses must be chosen from among the resident burgesses, and lose their privileges on becoming non-resident: no person who is non-resident can be elected a Burgess. New Radnor, in conjunction with Kevenleece, Knighton, Cnwclas, and Rhaiadr (to the number of which contributory boroughs Presteign was added, by the recent act to amend the representation), returns one member to parliament. The right of election has heretofore been vested in the burgesses generally: it is now, by the late act, extended to every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act demands: the present number of houses of this value within the limits of the borough (which have not been altered by the late Boundary Act), is one hundred and seventy-two: the bailiff is the returning officer. The recorder, bailiff, and aldermen, and also the bailiff and aldermen for the preceding year, are justices of the peace within the borough, the jurisdiction of which extends exclusively over the whole of the parishes of New Radnor, Old Radnor, and Llanvihangel - Nant-Melan, and parts of those of Cascob and Llandeglay. The corporation hold quarterly courts of session for the borough, on the

Monday after the quarter sessions for the county; a court of petty sessions; and a court, every Monday, in which the bailiff presides, assisted by the town-clerk, for the recovery of debts and the determination of pleas under the amount of forty shillings. The sheriff's court, for the recovery of debts not exceeding forty shillings, is held every month, alternately here and at Presteign. The court for the election of the knight of the shire may be held here, though it has not been so for nearly half a century: this has also, under the late Boundary Act, been made one of the polling-places. The town-hall, in which the various courts are held, and the public business of the corporation is transacted, is a mean building, in a state of very imperfect repair: it is situated in the principal street, and opposite to it is a small prison for the borough, consisting only of two rooms and an airing-yard. The parish comprises from two thousand five hundred to three thousand acres of rich loamy pasture land, and a fertile tract capable of producing good crops of corn: the upper part of it comprehends a portion of the mountain range of the forest of Radnor.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £13. 10. 10., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, and situated on the declivity of a lofty hill to the north of the town, is an ancient structure, roofed with tiles, with a handsome square tower, strengthened by buttresses, and containing five bells: the body consists of a nave, chancel, and aisle, but is in a very dilapidated condition: part of it appears to rest on the foundation of a more ancient building: the old church mentioned by Leland is no longer in existence. John Green, of Hereford, bequeathed to this parish the sum of £300, of the interest of which he appropriated £10 for the support of a charity school, £3 to be distributed in bread to the poor, and the remainder to be expended in purchasing articles for the church. An estate called Longney, in the county of Gloucester, was devised to this parish by Mr. Henry Smith, of London, in 1627, the proceeds of which are distributed among the poor: being subject to the inundations of the river Severn, it varies greatly in its annual value, which fluctuates from £7 to £15 per annum: there are also some smaller charitable donations and bequests to the poor. Of the ancient castle, which occupied the summit of a lofty eminence to the north-east of the town, there are only some inconsiderable vestiges: the walls of this structure, which was of great strength, comprised a quadrilateral area, divided into an outer and an inner ward: at the north-eastern and north-western angles were square massive towers. The entrance, which was on the south side, was defended by a similar tower at the south-western angle; and to the east were two circular towers of smaller dimensions. Some workmen digging on the site, in 1773, discovered six or seven arches of good masonry, which appeared to have supported a range of the principal buildings: the outer intrenchments are still in good preservation. The course of the walls by which the town was surrounded may be easily traced by the remains of their foundations, and of the deep moat on the outside. About a mile from the town, and near the western extremity of the parish, the narrow vale of the small river Somergil is intersected by an intrenched dyke; and in a narrow defile, about two miles to the west of the town, and in the parish of Llanvihangel-Nant-Melan, there is a curious and interesting cascade, called "Water break its neck." Immediately to the north of the town is the high mountainous tract forming the forest of Radnor, on which numerous flocks of sheep are bred, and from one of the summits of which, called Wimble, is a view of great extent over several of the adjoining counties, embracing some pleasing scenery in the neighbourhood of the town, with several gentlemen's seats, surrounded by plantations and pleasure grounds, and forming ornamental features in the landscape. Downton House, the property of Percival Lewis, Esq., and now the residence of W. S. R. Cockburn, Esq., only son of General Sir William Cockburn, Bart., is an elegant mansion, situated in beautiful grounds, and surrounded with interesting and pleasingly varied scenery. Radnor gives the title of earl to the family of Bouverie. The poor are maintained by an average annual expenditure amounting to £192.

RADNOR (OLD), or MAES-YVED-HËN, a parish, comprising the townships of Ednol, Evenjobb with Bareland, Harpton, Kinnarton with Badland, Old Radnor, and Walton, each supporting its own poor, in the liberties of the borough of NEW RADNOR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (E. S. E.) from New Radnor, containing 1458 inhabitants. This place by the Welsh is also called Pen y Graig, which name it derives from the situation of its church on the summit of a rock: it was anciently of some importance, and had a castle, which Sir Richard Colt Hoare identifies with that mentioned by Giraldus Cambrensis, under the appellation of "Cruker," but of which no vestiges can be discovered. In the Iter Carolinum it is noted that, "on 6th Aug., 1645, Charles I. went from Brecon to Gwernevit, the house of Sir H. Williams, to dinner; he supped at Old Radnor, at a yeoman's house, the court being dispersed: on the 7th he proceeded to Ludlow." The house here which gave temporary refuge to that unfortunate monarch is called "The Stones," and stands about half a mile to the west of the church. The parish, which is of very great extent, is intersected by a stream called Somergil, and also by the Hendwell, a brook issuing from a small lake of that name, which abounds with excellent trout and eels. The surface is principally flat, though partly undulating, and in some places rising into hills of considerable elevation: the lands, with the exception of some tracts of common, and some woodland, are enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The soil is in general a fertile loam, well adapted for the growth of corn, and affording pasturage for sheep and cattle. In the southern part of the parish there exists an extensive deposit of transition limestone, from which a most valuable supply of lime is obtained. The parish is intersected by the turnpike road from Hereford to Aberystwith. The surrounding scenery is agreeably diversified; and the neighbourhood is enlivened with several gentlemen's seats, among which are, Harpton Court, the residence of the Right Hon. Thomas Frankland Lewis, a handsome mansion situated in grounds tastefully laid out; Evenjobb, the seat of P. R. Mynors, Esq.; Womaston, that of S. Lewin, Esq.; and Newcastle Court, that of John Whittaker, Esq., all good houses pleasantly situated, and forming interesting features in the scenery of the place.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Hereford, rated in the king's books at £35. 1. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$ ., and in the possession of the Dean and Chapter of Worcester, by whom a stipendiary curate is appointed and paid, and is further supported by the interest of £800 parliamentary grant. The church, dedicated to St. Stephen, is a spacious and venerable structure, with a lofty square tower containing six bells: the body consists of a nave, with north and south aisles, and a chancel separated from the rest by a screen of richly carved oak, which extends across the nave and both the aisles: the font is of large dimensions, rudely carved out of a single stone; and on the north side of the chancel stand the remains of a singular organ case, of large size, elaborately though somewhat rudely carved in oak: there are some handsome monuments of modern erection to the family of Lewis, of Harpton. At Ednol and Kinnarton are chapels of ease to the mother church. There is a place of worship for Independents. Lady Joan Hartstongue bequeathed a house and twenty-five acres of land at Weythel, in this parish, for the foundation and endowment of a school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children of the parishes of Old Radnor, Llanvihangel-Nant-Melan, and Gladestry: the present annual income arising from the endowment is about £30, and is regularly appropriated to the support of the school. A farm called the Wolfpits, now producing £12 per annum, and another called the Broken Bank, in the parish of Gladestry, were bequeathed by an unknown benefactor to the poor of this parish. Mrs. Cassandra Davies, in 1635, bequeathed to the poor not receiving parochial relief some land in the township of Bareland, now producing £2 per annum, which is regularly paid; but a bequest of thirty shillings per annum, charged on an estate called the Callenders, has long ceased to be paid. Near the church are the remains of an ancient religious house, supposed to have been a nunnery: the moat by which it was surrounded is still plainly visible. Within the limits of the parish, and nearly in the centre of the Vale of Radnor, there is a singular relic of antiquity, generally supposed to be Druidical: it consists of four stones placed at the angles of a square, each stone being of such vast dimensions that it is as difficult to conjecture by what means as for what purpose they were placed there. Their position corresponds precisely with the cardinal points of the compass, the largest being to the south, and the smallest to the north; and they are ranged symmetrically, as far as their rude shapes will allow. A stone tablet is by some thought to have covered the whole; but the unequal height of the stones, and their distance from each other, render this supposition improbable. Whatever may have been the object of this monument of a rude and uncivilized age, its destruction is said by Camden to have taken place in the reign of John, when this district was ravaged by Rhys ab Gruffydd. The poor are maintained by an average annual expenditure amounting to £729. 17. for the entire parish, of which sum, £170. 10. is assessed on the township of Old Radnor.

RADNORSHIRE, an inland county of South Wales, bounded on the north by the county of Montgomery (in North Wales), on the west by Cardiganshire, on the south-west and south by Brecknockshire, on the east by the English county of Hereford, and on the north-east by that of Salop. It extends from  $52^{\circ} 2'$  to  $52^{\circ} 27'$  (N. Lat.), and from  $2^{\circ} 59'$  to  $3^{\circ} 45'$  (W. Lon.), and comprises an area, according to Mr. Carey's Communications to the Board of Agriculture, of three hundred and ninety square miles, or two hundred and forty-nine thousand six hundred statute acres. The population, in 1831, was 24,651.

As this district never contained any large or important town within its limits, or formed of itself a separate community until by the act of Henry VIII. it was raised to the rank of a county, it does not appear to have taken any signal or prominent part in the events which mark the troubled history of Wales. At the period of the invasion of Britain by the Romans, it formed part of the territory of the Silures, who so greatly distinguished themselves by their resolute opposition to the progress of the Roman arms. After their subjugation, which was partly effected by Ostorius Scapula, and completed by Julius Frontinus, it contained a Roman station at Cwm, on the western bank of the river Ithon, between one and two miles to the north-east of Llandrindod Wells, and was traversed by several vicinal ways. After the abandonment of Britain by the Romans, it became part of the territory of Ferregs, included between the rivers Severn and Wye, and was subjected to Caradog Vraich Vras, or "Caradoc with the Brawny Arm," ruler of Brecknock, who flourished about the commencement of the sixth century, and is celebrated in Welsh story, as one of Arthur's knights. The derivation of the present Welsh name of this county, Maesgyed or Maes-Hyved (which has been noticed under the head of New Radnor), is, however, by some persons deduced from Hyvaid, the name of one of the sons of Caradog Vraich Vras, for whom his father formed this portion of his territories into a separate lordship. Offa King of Mercia, having expelled the Britons from nearly the whole of the fertile province of Ferregs, introduced into this district a Saxon population, and formed the celebrated line of demarcation, still called Offa's Dyke, which, however, included within the Saxon territory only the easternmost extremity of the present county of Radnor. In the division of the sovereignty of Wales by Roderic the Great, among his three sons, the territory forming the present county of Radnor is thought to have been included in the kingdom of Powys. The scene of the great battle which was fought, about the year 1088, between Rhys ab Tewdwr and the sons of Bleddin ab Cynvyn, for the sovereignty of South Wales, and which terminated in favour of the former, has been generally laid at Llêchryd, in the parish of Disserth, near the banks of the Wye, in this county; but it is now, with more probability, considered to have been at Llêchrhŷd, on the Teivy, near Cardigan. After the Norman Conquest of England, the territory of Maesgyed became the prey of the Norman adventurers who successfully invaded the adjoining districts of Brecknockshire and Herefordshire: the family of de Breos, and afterwards the Mortimers, had the most extensive domains in it. In 1189, Rhys ab Gruffydd, Prince of South Wales, invading the marches, took the castles of Radnor and Painscastle in Elvel, in this county. Trehaern Vychan, a Welshman of great influence in the territory of Brecknock, having been treacherously and barbarously murdered, in 1196, by William de Breos, Lord of Brecknock and Abergavenny, Gwenwynwyn, Prince of Powys, who was related to Trehaern by marriage, marched a body of troops into de Breos' territories in Radnorshire, and laid siege to Painscastle, of which that baron had repossessed himself, declaring that, after he had gained possession of that fortress, he would devastate with fire the whole country as far as the Severn, a sacrifice which he owed to the manes of Trehaern Vychan, his kinsman. But the Welsh chieftain, having no means of destroying the fortifications, lay for three weeks before the castle without capturing it, which gave time for William de Breos to receive reinforcements from England, under Geoffry Fitz-Peter, the justiciary, and from several of the lords marcher, who came to his assistance. But as the issue of hostilities might be uncertain, he proposed terms of peace to Gwenwynwyn, which the latter indignantly refused, the Welsh declaring their firm resolution of avenging, in this enterprise, the past wrongs of their country. The English then released from confinement Gruffydd, son of the late Rhys ab Gruffydd, between whom and Gwenwynwyn they knew that a deadly feud subsisted; and, being joined by the Welsh forces immediately raised by that chieftain, they advanced to the relief of Painscastle. Gwenwynwyn, confident in his strength, deviated from the wary system of warfare generally pursued by his nation, and opposed the English in an open plain, where he was defeated, with the loss of three thousand men slain, besides a great number of prisoners, among whom were many of considerable note.

In the year 1282, Llewelyn, the last native sovereign of Wales, marched with his little army to Aberedwy, or Abereddown, where he had a castle or mansion, on the Radnorshire side of the Wye, three miles below Builth, in expectation of there holding a conference with some of his friends; but his object having been treacherously communicated to the enemy, he was surprised by the approach of a superior force from Herefordshire, under the command of Edmund Mortimer and John Gifford. The unfortunate prince then endeavoured to effect his escape, and arrived at the bridge over the Wye in time to cross and break it down, before his pursuers came up. Thus baffled in their object, the English returned downwards to a ford known to some of the party, about eight miles below, near a ferry at that time and still called Caban Twm Bâch, or "Little Tom's ferry boat," where they crossed, and thus ceased the movements of the two parties in this county: the sequel of this melancholy transaction is described in the article on ABEREDWY. During the war waged by Owain Glyndwr against Henry IV., the former, in the year 1401, destroyed the abbey of Cwm Hir, in this county, and took the castle of Radnor, causing the garrison, amounting to threescore men, to be beheaded on the brink of the castle yard. After this event, Owain, by his continued successes, excited so much alarm in Henry, that the latter resolved to march against him in person. He issued writs to the lieutenants of thirty-four counties; requiring them to assemble their respective forces, and attend him at Lichfield, on the 7th of July, 1402; but before his army could be collected, Owain had advanced with his troops to the borders of South Wales, in the direction of Herefordshire, carrying fire and sword into the lands of his opponents. Of these none suffered so severely as the vassals and tenants of Edward Mortimer, Earl of March, a child of ten years of age, whose uncle, Sir Edmund Mortimer, collected a large body of his nephew's tenants and retainers, as well in Herefordshire as from the district of Melienydd in Radnorshire, and with these marched to resist the invader. The two armies met on Brÿn Glâs, a mountain near Pilleth, a little to the south-west of Knighton, where victory declared in favour of Owain. Eleven hundred men fell on the side of Mortimer; and, as the loss fell chiefly on the people of Herefordshire, there seems reason to believe that March's Welsh retainers were not hearty in his cause. It is to this battle, and to some "shameful villanie," as Holinshed calls it, "used towards the dead carcases," that Shakspeare finely and mysteriously alludes, in the first part of Henry IV. When the conflicts had ceased, which "the irregular and wild Glendower" had excited, this district seems to have sunk into repose; but under the rule of the Lords Marcher, (a singular compound of hostility and government,) Wales, though sometimes composed, was never pacified. It was not until, by the act of the 27th of Henry VIII., cap. 26, the rights and privileges of English subjects were extended to Wales, that peace, order, and obedience were established: by that act Radnorshire was included amongst the newly established counties.

This county is partly in the diocese of Hereford, and partly in that of St. David's, and is wholly in the province of Canterbury: the portion included in the former diocese (consisting of the parishes of Presteign, Old and New Radnor, Norton, and Knighton) is comprised in the archdeaconry of Hereford, and deanery of Leominster, excepting the parish of Knighton, which is in the archdeaconry of Salop, and deanery of Clun; and that in the latter, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and deaneries of Elvel, and Melenith sub Ithon and ultra Ithon: the total number of parishes is fifty-three, of which fourteen are rectories, sixteen vicarages, and the rest perpetual curacies. For purposes of civil government it is divided into the six hundreds of Colwyn, Kevenleece or Cevnllÿs, Knighton, Painscastle, Radnor, and Rhaiadr. It returns to parliament one knight for the shire, and one member for the borough of New Radnor and the contributory boroughs of Presteign, Knighton, Rhaiadr, Cnwclas, and Kevenleece. The assizes and quarter sessions for the county are held at Presteign, where the gaol and house of correction are situated, and where the chief business of the county is transacted. The county elections are usually held there, though they may be held at New Radnor, where the member for the boroughs must be chosen. The polling-places appointed by the act to amend the representation are Colwyn, Knighton, Painscastle, Pen y bont, Presteign, Radnor, and Rhaiadr. Presteign, Knighton, and Rhaiadr, are the principal market towns: New Radnor has the privilege of a market, but none is held there. The parochial rates raised in the county for the year ending March 25th, 1829, amounted to £14,468, and the expenditure to £14,655, of which, £12,163 were applied to the relief of the poor.

Radnorshire is one of the most regularly shaped counties in the principality, being a trapezium, the mean dimensions of which are about twenty-two miles by twenty. Its surface throughout is hilly; in many places the mountains attain to a considerable elevation, the summit of the Forest of Radnor being three thousand one hundred and sixty-three feet above the level of the sea: the hills have generally a regular outline, with gradual slopes and rounded summits, though in many parts abrupt declivities and deep ravines relieve the monotony of the scenery. It contains several small lakes worthy of mention, viz., one in the vicinity of Rhaiadr, near the road leading from that town to Aberystwith, the most picturesque and interesting within its limits; Llÿn Gwÿn, a piece of water of considerable size, situated within a few miles of Rhaiadr, in the opposite direction; Llÿn Llanilin, about a mile in circumference, of considerable depth, and containing abundance of fish, singularly situated near Llanvihangel Nant-Melan, in an elevated mountain valley; and Llÿn Bychlllyn, in the vicinity of Painscastle.

Of the superficial area of the county, about one-third is supposed to be enclosed, and of this enclosed portion not more than a fourth part is under the plough at the same time. In the vicinity of market-towns, and on farms where the soil is good, the cultivation of grain for sale prevails to a considerable extent: but, as regards the whole of the county, it must be observed, that the distance from large corn markets, the high price of lime, and the roughness and moisture of the climate, operate as great discouragements to the growth of grain; and the chief object of the farmers is to grow only what is sufficient for their own consumption, viewing their stock of sheep, cattle, and horses as the main sources of their profit. It is a common practice to plough a piece of sward (which is sometimes pared and burnt for a crop of wheat), and to take, in the first instance, one or two crops of oats; then to summer fallow the land, giving it all the manure of the farm, and what lime can be procured, for a crop of wheat: after this the land is generally thought capable of bearing a crop of barley, with which the better sort of farmers sow clover and grass seeds; the crop is mown the first year, and afterwards the land is suffered to rest, whilst some other portion of the farm undergoes the same process. Rye and a mixture of rye and wheat (called Monk's corn) were formerly much grown, but are now seldom seen. Potatoes, as a field crop, are extensively and successfully cultivated: peas, though precarious and unprofitable, are sometimes sown; and flax, for domestic purposes, rather than for sale. In the mode of cultivation there is little that is peculiar; the implements are cheap and imperfect, though much improved. A light cart, drawn by three small stout horses, is in general use: waggons also are common. A ground sledge, with two wheels in front, is found useful in drawing heavy weights down steep declivities; and a rude car without any wheels is still used for conveying peat from the mountains. The ploughs in general use have a bent iron mould-board, similar to those in Herefordshire; but the Scotch plough, drawn by two horses abreast, is gradually advancing into use throughout the county. The fertile districts which are found in the vales of Wye, Lug, and Tawe (to which may also be added the vale of Radnor) are subject to a better system of cultivation: in these tracts turnips are grown to a considerable extent, being drilled on ridges, in imitation of the Scotch practice. On the red soils of Glásbury and Clyro the two favourite objects of Herefordshire husbandry, namely, the hop and the apple, may be cultivated with advantage. Throughout the whole county irrigation is successfully, though somewhat rudely and unskilfully, practised: the rapid fall of the brooks facilitates the construction of new water courses, which are not unfrequently conducted in long continued lines along the steep sides of the valleys: the purest water, issuing at once from the clay slate rocks, frequently produces most fertilizing effects, in cases where no deposit of earthy matter can be discerned by the eye. The assistance thus obtained from various mountain streams enables the farmers to mow annually considerable tracts of land, the produce of which chiefly supports their cattle and horses during the winter. Such land as cannot be irrigated, and which may be also either too steep and rugged, or at too great a distance from the farm-yard, to be advantageously ploughed, is usually devoted to the pasturage of cattle and horses, both of which are reared in considerable numbers. The black cattle, which still prevail in the adjoining county of Cardigan, have not for many years been much bred in Radnorshire: they gave place to a coarse hardy variety of the long-horned breed, introduced from Shropshire, which were generally of a brindled colour, and gave much milk: some of these still remain, but they have in a great measure been superseded by the Herefordshire breed, which, being found to be sufficiently hardy to endure the scanty food and rough climate, have the advantage of growing to a larger size, and possess a greater aptitude to fatten. The draught horse in general use is small and ill-shaped, but capable of enduring great fatigue. The original Welsh ponies are still bred in the mountains, and their price in the markets has of late years increased: of their activity, courage, and patience, and of their strength as compared with their size and the little sustenance they require, it is difficult to dilate in terms too favourable. Where so large a portion of the surface is unenclosed, the pasturage of the commons necessarily forms an object of interest to the farmers: on the lower ranges of commons the young cattle of the farm, of every kind, are frequently depastured; but for the most part cattle are found to require more attendance and care than can well be afforded them on commons. Throughout the entire county the breeding of sheep is the primary object of the farmers adjoining the open lands. On the western side of it a small active breed prevails, mostly without horns, with white faces and legs, and having long, open, coarse wool, abounding with kemps. But in the forest of Radnor, and on the lower hills on the north and south of that elevated range, a breed has been produced by the introduction of rams from Shropshire: these sheep are well covered with a fleece of thick close wool, and have larger carcases than those just described: they are, however, much less hardy, and can only be maintained by farmers who can afford some shelter to their stock during the winter. Throughout the county it is the practice to take the ewes into the enclosed grounds in October, and, if possible, the lambs of the preceding spring also: the wether sheep, for the most part, brave the climate of the hills during the whole of the year. These sheep, when fat, usually weigh from nine to fourteen lb. per quarter; and their fleeces average from two to three lb.: vast numbers of them are annually driven into Essex and Hertfordshire, where the superior quality of the mutton ensures for them a ready sale. Large quantities of butter are still made in the county, though it is chiefly an object to the smaller farmers: it is salted during the summer, and placed with great care and cleanliness in tubs, in which it was thus formerly carried to the fairs in Herefordshire: this article of produce, however, has of late years been sold by the farmers at their own houses. Oxen, which were formerly much used in husbandry, are now sold at too early an age to be so employed, and almost the whole draught of the county is now executed by horses. In a county of which nearly two-thirds are unenclosed it may be presumed that there exists great capability of improvement, and the large tracts of low commons which are seen on passing through the centre of it tend to confirm this idea. Of late years, considerable encroachments have been made on the wastes both by cottagers and by farmers, and even this lawless process has tended somewhat to improve the lands taken in. About six parishes have been submitted to the operation of enclosure acts, but the expense which attends the allotment of the land, and the still greater cost of maintaining the fences, discourage any further attempts of this sort: from one of these attempts, indeed, in the immediate vicinity of Rhaiadr, the most beneficial effects have resulted, the produce of a small common having been increased many hundredfold, to the great advantage of the inhabitants of that town. Many tracts still remain which are susceptible of almost equal improvement; but the rough surface of the pasture land throughout the greater part of the county, overgrown as it is, in many parts, with rushes, shews that, without an extensive and effectual system of drainage, the soil can never be brought to its utmost point of fertility. It is by this, rather than any other, mode that the improvement of the low lands can be effected. On the hills the use of iron wire in fencing has been introduced to some extent, and is likely to enable the farmers to defend their lands from the mountain sheep, where no other means would avail.

Radnorshire was anciently distinguished for extensive woods and forests, but these, excepting a few scattered coppices of comparatively small extent, have disappeared. The forests of Radnor and of Blethvaugh continue such in name, and still suggest the idea of extensive wooded tracts; but if at any time they were covered with wood, which may at least be doubted, they have long ceased to be so. The mountain sheep have been the chief destroyers of the woods; no ordinary fences can restrain them, and when once a wood has been felled, by browsing the young shoots in the spring, they have effectually prevented a renewed growth. On the estates of the principal landed proprietors thriving young plantations of forest trees are seen. The larch is likely to be grown to a considerable extent on the steep declivities of the mountains. This hardy plant, which pines in the moist and fertile plains of the South of England, thrives in this elevated district. Its rapid growth, when young, enables it soon to lift its head beyond the reach of the sheep, which will not, except when pressed by severe hunger, either bark or browse on it. It is popular, too, because it foliates so early in spring, that it is clothed for weeks with the most vivid green, when no other tree has unfolded a bud; and again in autumn its golden tint serves to enliven even the latter half of November.

The geological structure of the county is but imperfectly known, there being no mineral productions sufficiently valuable to have hitherto attracted much attention to it. The great mass of the county consists of the same grey wackè slate which prevails through the whole of the principality: it emerges from beneath the old red sandstone of the counties of Hereford and Brecknock, a part of which fertile stratum is found on the northern side of the Wye, and constitutes the most productive tract within the county. The red soil prevails in the parishes of Glàsbury, Clyro, Llowes, Boughrood, and some others in the hundred of Painscastle. The upper beds of the grey wackè, or clay slate, very much resemble the lowest beds of the old red sandstone; insomuch that the produce of a quarry worked near the summit of the Forest of Radnor is of the same granular and micaceous texture as the tile of Clyro hill. But these beds soon disappear, and give place to a stratified lead-coloured rock, of rhomboidal fracture, so perishable as to be useless for roofing houses, and scarcely applicable either to masonry or the making of roads. It must be observed, however, that the lower beds of this formation are much harder and more durable than the upper; so that on the western verge of the county, in the neighbourhood of Rhaiadr, coarse durable slates of good colour, and very strong stones for building purposes, are obtained. The dip of the strata throughout the great slate formation will be found, on examination, to be extremely irregular: it has been disturbed by the contact of two very considerable and independent trap formations, which occur in different parts of the county; one has been described by Dr. Gilby, and has its western termination in the river Wye, about a mile above Builth, opposite to which town it rises in high, rugged, irregular masses, forming the ridges of the Carneddau hills, and, stretching northwards by Penkerrig and Llwynmattock, it passes Llandrindod and Kevenleece, where one branch diverges, and terminates at Llandeglay; the other passes to Llanbadarn-Vawr, near which it disappears, though an independent mass of the same formation occurs at some distance, called Baxter's Bank. This remarkable tract is perfectly irregular throughout, being neither columnar nor stratified: its mineralogical characters vary at almost every step; feldspar is probably the chief component part. Around its base mineral springs are found, which deservedly enjoy a very high reputation. At Llandrindod are a salt, a sulphur, and a steel water; at Builth are the same, though of a coarser quality: at Llandeglay and Blaen-ddw the sulphur springs are also found. Round the edges of this formation the clay slate of the county is found broken up, disturbed, and in some places evidently turned over; and both its colour and its texture have been so altered by the contact, that it has become black and friable, and is not unfrequently mistaken for coal, or at least is thought to indicate its presence. The other trap formation mentioned above has not yet been described by any geologist: it occurs near Old Radnor, and is separated from the Llandeglay formation by a distance of seven miles, and by high intervening hills composed wholly of clay slate. It consists of four considerable hills, of which those of Old Radnor and Stanner appear to be connected, both of them being in some degree independent of the two other hills,—Hautes and Worsel. They are all wholly irregular and unstratified, and differ so much in mineralogical character from the Llandeglay range as to suggest the probability of a different period of formation. Sienite and porphyry occur in many parts; and a coarse amygdaloidal trap is met with at the base of Old Radnor hill, near the church: the character of the whole bears some resemblance to granite, though neither feldspar nor mica prevails to any great extent. The hill at Old Radnor appears to have raised with it a considerable mass of grey stratified transition limestone, the strata of which lie round the base of the trap rock, dipping from it in every direction: on the north and east sides these beds have been nearly exhausted, but on the south and west vast and almost inexhaustible masses still remain. This stone emits a strong and disagreeable odour on being broken: it contains shells, though not in abundance, and corals, and has throughout a chrySTALLINE texture. As a manure for land, the lime obtained from it is more valuable than that produced by the carboniferous or mountain limestone, which is used so extensively in North and South Wales; as a cement it is inferior, though it is extensively used for mortar, there being no stratum of limestone that can be worked between Old Radnor and the sea-coast of Cardiganshire. As the four formations already described, namely, the old red sandstone of the hundred of Painscastle, the pervading grey wackè slate, the trap formations, and the limestone of Old Radnor, constitute and define the geological character of this county, no minerals of value can be looked for within its limits. Coal can scarcely exist to an extent worth working. Some narrow seams of lead have been found and worked near Llandrindod and Llandeglay, and one is now being worked near Cwm Elain. As connected with the geological structure of the county it may be observed, that wherever the soil consists of the wreck of the clay, or grey wackè, slate, it is porous and fertile, though of a less powerful and productive character than the soils which result from the old red sandstone. The soils which are composed of the detritus of the trap rocks are clayey and retentive of water, the surface for the most part being covered with a thin layer of peaty soil. It is remarkable that the wreck of these rocks has been carried and deposited to the south and east of their positions, to a much greater extent than in any other direction. Their fertility, however, is greatly increased by the addition of lime, the supply of which from Old Radnor, and from a mass of similar rock which occurs at Nash, in Herefordshire, not far from Presteign, has been lately facilitated and augmented by the construction of a rail-road from the canal at Brecknock, by Hay and Kingston, to Old Radnor. The total consumption of coal in the two districts of limestone rock is said to amount to about five thousand tons annually.

The chief commerce of Radnorshire consists in the sale of its agricultural produce at the public fairs and markets. The trade in manufactured goods and in foreign and colonial produce is small, little being sold excepting for immediate consumption. Until within the last few years the chief supply of these articles was introduced through Kington, either from the respective manufacturing districts or from Bristol; but the construction of an easy road from the canal at Newtown in Montgomeryshire, through the centre of this county, to Builth in Brecknockshire, has enabled the inhabitants to derive what is necessary for their use from the marts of Liverpool and Chester. Small manufactures of flannel exist at Rhaiadr, Maestryloe near Presteign, and at Llanvihangel-Rhydithon. Considerable quantities of hides are tanned and dressed, and find a market out of the county. The rivers are none of them navigable, and no canal has been constructed, within the limits of the county.

The principal rivers are, the Wye, with some of its tributaries, and the Teme. The romantic and rapid Wye, the scenery on the banks of which has so frequently been the subject of the pencil and the pen, rises on the southern side of Plinlimmon mountain, in Montgomeryshire, about a mile from the source of the Severn, and, flowing first southward, then eastward, and again southward, for about eleven miles through desolate wastes, enters this county about four miles to the north of Rhaiadr, and crosses the north-western extremity of it, by that town, to its confluence with the Elain, where it becomes the boundary between Radnorshire and Brecknockshire, and so continues during the remainder of its course in the principality (a distance of thirty miles), excepting a short interval at Glásbury, where a small portion of Radnorshire is situated on its southern banks. The Elain, (anglicè the Roe), also affording many attractions to the admirers of the picturesque, is a powerful stream from the westward, which for several miles separates the north-western extremity of the county of Radnor from the northern part of Brecknockshire. With this accession of waters the Wye shapes its course south-south-eastward, until within a short distance of the town of Builth, in Brecknockshire, when it turns south-eastward: at the southernmost extremity of Radnorshire it winds north-eastward, and quits this county and Wales on entering the English county of Hereford at the town of Hay, in Brecknockshire, after a turbulent course of about forty-seven miles. The principal tributaries to the Wye from Radnorshire are, the Ithon, which descends from the mountains in the north-eastern extremity of the county, and on its junction with the Wye near Disserth, five miles from Builth, after a course of about twenty miles south-westward, is of nearly equal magnitude with that river itself; the romantic Eddw, or Edwy, which joins it about four miles below Builth; and the gloomily picturesque Mâchwy, or Bâchwy, which falls into it a few miles lower. The Teme rises in the Kerry hills, in Montgomeryshire, and forms the entire boundary between this county and that of Salop, which it enters a little below the town of Knighton. The Lug, the Somergil, and the Arrow, are all tributary to the Wye, but do not join it in this county. The Lug has its source in the Llangunllo hills, and flows south-westward through the Vale of Llangunllo, into Herefordshire, which county it enters after forming the eastern boundary of Radnorshire for some distance below Whitton and Presteign. The Somergil rises in the Forest of Radnor, and one of its tributary streams forms the cascade called "Water break its neck:" it soon enters the basin-like Vale of Radnor, by the dry gravelly soil of which it is wholly absorbed in dry summers: on reaching a bed of clay it re-appears, after flowing by New and Old Radnor, and enters Herefordshire after a course of about thirteen miles. The Arrow is a small stream which flows by New Church towards Kington, in Herefordshire. In 1812, an act of parliament was obtained for the formation of a rail-road from the canal near the town of Brecknock, by Hay, to Kington, a branch of which is continued to the Weythel lime rocks near Old Radnor, between three and four miles to the west-north-west of Kington: this line of communication confers considerable benefit on the county, by supplying the south-eastern part of it with coal, and in return conveying agricultural produce to the mining districts of Brecknockshire and Glamorganshire. The roads which pass through the centre of the county have been much improved of late years, and are now remarkably good; but the cross roads are in general of an inferior kind. That from London to Radnor by Hereford enters the county from Kington: one of the roads to Presteign passes through Hereford. The road from London to Aberystwith, by Worcester, enters from Leominster, in Herefordshire, and passes through Kington, New Radnor, and Rhaiadr, into Cardiganshire: three miles beyond New Radnor, a branch of this road diverges to Builth, in Brecknockshire. A new and beautiful line of road from Rhaiadr to Aberystwith has been lately completed, which passes along the banks of the Wye for some miles from the former town, through Llangurig in Montgomeryshire.

Though there may be traced numberless intrenchments and mounds scattered over the county, which mark the ruins of former fortresses, the remains of antiquity are upon the whole of minor interest: the name Castell Pren (or castle built of wood), which still exists in several instances, suggests the probability of many of these intrenchments having been fortified only with a stockade. The Roman station already mentioned, may be distinctly traced on a farm called Cwm, about two miles to the north-east of Llandrindod Wells. This camp is a perfect square, including an area of about four acres, and appears to have been originally surrounded by a thick stone wall, the massive foundations of which are yet visible, with a deep fosse on the outside: at a short distance are vestiges of other military works and buildings. The vicinal roads from Carmarthen, and the Gaer near Brecknock, to Chester, appear to have united at this station, from which a branch, passing through the centre of Radnorshire, is thought to have proceeded to Kenchester in Herefordshire, but no traces of such a work have hitherto been discovered. In the parish of Llandewi-Ystradenny, about four miles above Pen y bont, near the Vale of Ithon, is an ancient British encampment, called the Gaer, which is oval, and defended by two deep fosses. It occupies an eminence above the river; and on the opposite side of the valley there is a large tumulus, or barrow, called Bedd Ygre, or Ygre's Grave, on an estate belonging to J. C. Severn, Esq. In the vicinity of Rhaiadr are several remarkable tumuli, some of which are composed wholly of stones, and bear the descriptive name of carneddau.

the largest is situated in the parish of Cwm-toyddwr, and is called Tommen Saint Fraid, or the tumulus of St. Bridget. There is also a large tumulus close to the churchyard of Aberedw. Of the numerous buildings for military defence little can now be ascertained. Camden says, "there remain many footings of castles, to be seene here and there, but especially Kevenllece and Timbod, which, standing upon a sharp poynted hill, Llewellyn, Prince of South Wales, overthrew in the year 1260." The same author also says, that the castle of Maud in Colwyn was very famous, and that Robert de Todeney, a noble Norman, was lord of it. It took its name from Maud of Saint Valeric, wife to William de Breos, who rebelled against King John. The castle being thrown down by the Welsh, was rebuilt in 1231 by Henry III., and called by him, in despite of Llewelyn, Prince of Wales, Maugrè Llewellyn. The fortress at Rhaiadr owed its origin to other hands. The celebrated chief, Rhys ab Gruffydd, had, in 1169, made peace with Henry III., and became attached to English interests. In 1176, he gave a feast in the castle of Cardigan, to which he invited many Normans and English: these visitors, however, were treacherously murdered by his son-in-law, Einion; and, to awe his enraged and revengeful opponents, Rhys is said to have "built the castle of Rhaiadr, on precipitous strong ground, (near the noted cataract of that name,) above the Wye," where the fosse and ruins of a considerable fortress may still be distinctly traced. There are small remains of the castle of Aberedw, or Aberedwy, at the junction of the Edw, or Edwy, with the Wye; of that of Bâchrhŷd, or Boughrood, lower down on the banks of the Wye; of that of New Radnor; of the castle of the Black Rock, overhanging the tremendous chasm through which runs the river Mâchwy, or Bâchwy, anglicè Little Wye; and of a small fortress on the banks of the Wye, about two miles above Builth. There are also vestiges of the town walls and ditch of New Radnor; of the moat of Castell Cymaron, near Llandewi-Ystradenny; of the foundations of Castell Glyn Ithon, at Kevenllece; of those of Dinboeth, or Tynboeth, castle, near the upper extremity of the Vale of Ithon; of those of Payne's castle. Offa's Dyke, entering on the north from Shropshire, is first seen in Radnorshire near the town of Knighton, to which it gives its Welsh name of Trêv y Clawdd, or "the Town on the Dyke," and whence, proceeding southward, it is easily traced between the parishes of Norton and Whitton to the vicinity of Beggar's Bush, where it inclines to the south-east, and enters Herefordshire at the parish of Knill. Burva Bank, a steep hill on the border of the county, near this place, is skirted on the west by this dyke, which is about fifty feet broad, and of great depth: on this hill are traces of some intrenchments, which have induced the opinion that it was the site of one of the forts by which the great rampart was defended. Of ecclesiastical buildings there have never been many worthy of much notice: the foundations of the abbey founded at Cwm Hir, in 1143, by Cadwallon ab Madre, for sixty monks of the Cistercian order (the only religious house existing in the county at the period of the Reformation), are yet visible in the valley of the little river Clywedog, a tributary to the Ithon. The names of Monaghty near Knighton, and Coed y Monach, near Rhaiadr, indicate a monkish connection, of which little is known. The churches at Old Radnor and Presteign still remain as proofs that the influence of that pious zeal by which Great Britain acquired such splendid places of public worship, was not wholly excluded from this portion of Wales; but, with the exception of Clyro, Knighton, Nantmel, Glâsbury, and a few others, the churches throughout the county are of an inferior description. The principal gentlemen's residences are, Maeslough Castle, the seat of Walter Wilkins, Esq.; Stannage Park, that of Edward Rogers, Esq.; Harpton Court, that of the Right Hon. Thomas Frankland Lewis; Boultribrook, that of Sir Harford Jones Brydges, Bart.; Boughrood Castle, that of — Fowke, Esq.; Penkerrig, that of Thomas Thomas, Esq.; Wellfield House, that of Edward Thomas, Esq.; Pen y bont Hall, that of J. C. Severn, Esq.; Downton House, that of Percival Lewis, Esq.; Evenjobb House, that of Peter Rickards Mynors, Esq.; Newcastle Court, that of John Whittaker, Esq.; Noyadd, that of Hugh Powell Evans, Esq.; Nantgwilt, that of Thomas Lewis Lloyd, Esq.; and Cwmelan, that of Robert Peel, Esq. There is a curious old house at Devanner Park, formerly the residence of the Fowlers, now the property of Mrs. Severn.

This county contains a greater number of mineral springs than all the others of South Wales conjointly. Those at Llandrindod have for many years been held in great repute, and are much resorted to in the summer by valetudinarians: they are three in number, the waters of one of which are saline, containing Epsom salt, sea salt, and some earth; those of another sulphureous, containing hepatic air and sea salt; and those of the third powerfully chalybeate, containing a considerable portion of iron in a volatile acid, and probably a neutral salt. The two first are very near each other, and are situated within a short distance of the principal lodging-house for the accommodation of visitors; but the latter is about half a mile north-eastward from the others, in a little rocky valley on the contiguous waste. Llandeglay well, near the public road between New Radnor and Rhaiadr, and Blaen Edw wells, distant therefrom about two miles south-eastward, which are all sulphureous, are of considerable note, and much frequented. Near Pen y bont, on the Ithon, are two springs, one sulphureous, and the other chalybeate. The following springs are all sulphureous: viz., Fynnon Ddewi, or St. David's Well, in the parish of Llanbadarn Vynydd; New Well, in the parish of Llanano; and two springs in the parish of Llanbister, within ten yards of each other, one depositing a black, the other a reddish sediment, the latter of which turns copper white and silver yellow in a very short space of time. Several springs in the vicinity of these at Llanbister deposit a black sediment, and their waters are reputed to have great efficacy in the cure of scorbutic complaints. The most remarkable waterfall is that quaintly called "Water break its neck," situated in a narrow defile among the hills of Radnor Forest, about two miles to the west of New Radnor: its height is about one hundred and seventy feet. English is spoken in Radnorshire almost universally; so that it is rare to find a peasant who understands Welsh, except in the north-western angle of the county beyond Rhaiadr, consisting of the parishes of St. Harmon and Cwm-toyddwr, the inhabitants of which for the most part speak the Welsh only; and in these two parishes alone is the church service now performed in that language. By what means the inhabitants of this county have acquired the use of the tongue in which the laws are administered and knowledge is disseminated it is not easy to trace. The Saxon names of Norton, Whittton, Knighton, and many others on the eastern border shew that these places were wrested from the Welsh at an early period. In their immediate neighbourhood, however, the ancient language continued to be spoken till little more than a century ago; and in the parish church of Llanvihangel Nant-Melan, within three miles of New Radnor, the Welsh Bible still remains which was used in the service of that church, though no Welsh is now spoken within twenty miles of it.

RADYR (RHAIADR), a parish in the hundred of KIBBOR, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. W. by W.) from Cardiff, containing 227 inhabitants. This parish, of which the name, signifying a cataract, is probably derived from the rushing waters of the river Tâf, on which it is situated, and by which it is bounded on the north-east, was formerly comprehended within the hundred of Miskin, from which it has been recently separated. It comprises about eleven hundred acres of arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation; the surface is in some parts elevated and in others flat, but no where subject to inundation; the soil is a strong brown earth, favourable to the production of good crops of grain of all kinds, potatoes, and hay. The substratum is partly a hard brown stone, and partly limestone of very good quality. Radyr Court, formerly the seat of the family of Matthew, ancestors of the late Lord Llandaf, has been partly taken down, and the remainder has been modernized, and converted into a farm-house. The turnpike road leading from Cardiff to Llantrissant passes a little to the south of the parish; and the tram-road from the Penttyrch works to the tin-mills at Melin Gruffydd passes through it. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, endowed with £60 per annum, private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Earl of Plymouth, who is improprator of the great tithes: there is no glebe land attached to the living. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is a neat plain edifice, with a curious turret at the west end. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. A Sunday school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children is supported by subscription. In this parish is a spring of very cold water, called Y Pistyll Goleu, "the bright water-spout," which issues from the side of a hill, under a considerable depth of earth over a limestone rock: it has by some writers been called a mineral spring, but it is not known to possess any other properties than that of its extreme coldness, which renders it efficacious in curing sprains and weakness of the sinews. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £195. 7.

RAKE, a joint township with Manor, in the parish of HAWARDEN, hundred of MOLD, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES. The population is included in the return for Manor.

REDBARTH (RYDBERTH), a parish in the hundred of NARBERTH, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (N. W.) from Tenby, containing 134 inhabitants. This place was formerly a hamlet in the parish of Carew, from which it has been severed and erected into a distinct parish of itself: it is situated in the south-eastern part of the county, and is of very small extent. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1200 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and originally in the presentation of the Vicar of Carew, but now, by lapse or otherwise, in that of the Bishop of St. David's. The church having fallen into a very dilapidated condition, is now undergoing complete repair. There is a small place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £6. 16.

RESOLVEND (SOLVEN), a hamlet in the parish of LANTWIT LOWER, hundred of NEATH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (N. E. by E.) from Neath, containing 261 inhabitants. This place is situated in the upper part of the parish, near the left bank of the river Neath, where the mountains are lofty and rugged, and their declivities and the glens well covered with timber. Here is a chapel of ease to the parish church. Solven hill is an elevated mountain in this hamlet, at the western base of which, overlooking the river Neath, are the remains of Glyn castle: the streams which flow into that river through the glens of the mountains form many pleasing cascades.

REYNOLDSTON, a parish in the hundred of SWANSEA, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 12 miles (W. by S.) from Swansea, containing 220 inhabitants. This place, which is situated in the peninsula of Gower, is supposed to derive its name from Reginald de Breos, who was lord of the manor, and is said to have been the founder of the church. The parish, which is of considerable extent, comprises some fine portions of arable and pasture land, which are enclosed and in a good state of cultivation, and a large tract of uncultivated and mountainous common, affording excellent pasturage for sheep, which are remarkable for the fineness of their wool, and the excellent quality of the mutton. The village, which contains several neat cottages, is pleasantly situated under the southern declivity of the mountainous ridge called Cevn y Bryn, from the summit of which a most extensive and magnificent view is obtained of the country on both sides. From this eminence the peninsula of Gower appears to be completely insulated; the river Burry hence forms a conspicuous and interesting object, with the town of Llanelly on the opposite bank, and at its extreme point the village of Penbre: the view embraces also the bay of Oxwich, with the parish church, and the woods of Penrice castle, with the village and tower, while in intervening spaces are scattered the pleasing villages of Reynoldston, Knelston, and Llanddewi. Stout Hall, the seat of John Lucas, Esq., is a handsome modern residence, situated in extensive grounds finely laid out, and embracing much interesting scenery; and Fairy Hill, the residence of the late Lady Barham, to whose munificence the dissenters of Gower are indebted for the erection of four neat chapels in the peninsula, is also in this parish. Limestone abounds in the parish, and is procured in great quantities for the supply of the neighbourhood; the soil in the lower grounds is fertile, and the air is remarkable for its purity. A small rivulet, which has its rise on Cevn y Bryn, after traversing the parish, falls into the Loughor, below the church at Cheriton, and gives to that river its own name, the Burry, during the finest part of its course, extending from the ferry at Loughor to its mouth.

The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5. 11. 0½., and in the patronage of C. R. M. Talbot, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. George, is an ancient structure, not remarkable for any important architectural details. A school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children is supported by the benevolence of Miss Talbot. In Brÿn field, in this parish, are the remains of an ancient encampment of small size, which, from the discovery of some broken urns in the fosse by which it was surrounded, is supposed to be of Roman origin: it is now nearly levelled. On the summit of Cevn y Brÿn, along which a good road was made by T. M. Talbot, Esq., affording a delightful ride, and commanding an extensive and beautiful prospect over the Bristol channel to the coasts of Devon, Pembroke, and Carmarthen, are several large heaps of stones, more especially on the eastern side, where there is one called the Beacon: these are probably sepulchral mounds, and perhaps of Druidical origin. In the grounds of Stout Hall, and near a rustic bridge, is a "Maen Gwyr," a huge stone, of the same kind as Arthur's stone, about ten feet in length; and not far distant is a small circle of upright stones, placed there by Mr. Lucas, father of the present proprietor, and forming a miniature representation of Stonehenge. In the same grounds there is one of the most extensive caverns in the kingdom, accidentally discovered by the late Mr. Lucas, who, perceiving a small aperture in the limestone rock, containing a very strong clay, proceeded to clear it out; and finding the cavity expand inward, he fully explored the interior, by removing several thousand tons of clay, and occasionally blasting the rock. The bottom of the cavern is a plain surface, about forty feet below the level of the ground, and the roof, which is finely arched, varies from ten to thirty-six feet in height: it is capable of containing two thousand persons, and is entered in one part by a long flight of steps rudely formed, and in another by a gradual descent; the interior, which has an imposing grandeur of appearance, is tolerably lighted by some natural openings in the incumbent strata. On Cevn y Brÿn there is a remarkable well, called Holy Well, a very copious spring included in a square enclosure of some antiquity. Near the church is a well dedicated to St. George, and at no great distance from it is another, dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, and supposed to possess medicinal properties. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £31. 13.

REYNOLDSTON, a parish in the hundred of NARBERTH, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (S. by W.) from Narberth, containing 109 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated in the south-eastern part of the county, and on the turnpike road leading from Narberth to Pembroke, comprises but a very small tract of arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The village has every appearance of antiquity, and in all probability was originally inhabited by a portion of the Flemings to whom Henry I. assigned territories in this part of the principality, with a view to strengthen his interests in the country, and for the greater security of the possessions which the Normans had usurped from the natives. Though now fallen almost into decay, some of the cottages have still the round chimneys which usually distinguish the Flemish dwellings. This place was formerly only a hamlet in the parish of Begelly. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's, though formerly, for some time after the endowment of its church, in that of the Rector of Begelly. The church is a small ancient edifice, with a low tower, and in a very dilapidated condition. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £11. 2.

RHAIADR, a borough, market town, and parish, in the hundred of RHAIADR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 16 miles (W. N. W.) from New Radnor, 23 (W.) from Presteign, and 177 (W. N. W.) from London, containing 669 inhabitants. This place, the name of which signifies a cataract, is by the Welsh more commonly called "Rhaiadr Gwy," from its situation on the river Wye, the water of which, rushing with great violence over a ledge of rocks that obstructed its course, formed a cataract, of which the roaring might be heard at a considerable distance, till, on the erection of a stone bridge at this place, in the year 1780, a wider channel was opened for the stream, by clearing away the opposing rocks, since which time it has passed on in comparative tranquillity. The town is evidently of great antiquity; but at what time it was first inhabited is not precisely known. According to Caradoc of Llancarvan, a castle was erected here, in 1178, by Rhÿs ab Gruffydd, Prince of South Wales, for the protection of his territories against the incursions of the Norman invaders, who at that time were making frequent irruptions into this part of the principality. In 1194, Rhÿs was surprised and made prisoner by his own sons, and, during his confinement, the castle of Rhaiadr was besieged by the sons of Cadwallon ab Madoc, lord of Maelienydd, who, having succeeded in obtaining possession of it, fortified it strongly for their own use. In 1231, Llewelyn, Prince of North Wales, after taking the castle of Montgomery, putting its garrison to the sword, and burning that town to the ground, advanced to this place, where he made similar devastations. Little further is recorded of the history of the castle, which existed till the civil war in the reign of Charles I., during which it was first dismantled and afterwards totally demolished. By an act of the 27th of Henry VIII., the assizes for the county were appointed to be held alternately here and at New Radnor; but, by a subsequent act of the same reign, they were ordered to be held alternately at New Radnor and at Presteign, in consequence of the inhabitants of this place having put to death the sheriff.

The town is situated on the eastern bank of the river Wye, and on the turnpike roads leading respectively from Worcester through New Radnor to Aberystwith, and from Builth in Brecknockshire to Llanidloes, in the county of Montgomery. It appears to have been originally of much greater extent than at present; for on Cevn Ceido there is a tract of land, about half a mile from the town, called Pant yr Eglwys, where, according to tradition, the church formerly stood, and to which the borough is said to have extended. The present town consists of four streets, diverging at right angles from the market-house in the centre, and extending nearly in the direction of the cardinal points, from which they take their names: the houses are irregularly built, and mostly of rather mean appearance, though several respectable dwellings have been erected within the last three years: the inhabitants are supplied with water by rivulets, which, descending from a spring a little above, flow through the town, which stands on ground rising gently from the banks of the Wye, and surrounded on all sides by lofty, wild, and barren hills, occasionally relieved with patches of plantations on their declivities, and by spots of cultivated ground at their bases. The woollen manufacture is carried on upon a small scale, there being one establishment in the town, and two in the suburb of Llansantfraid, on the opposite bank of the Wye, for the manufacture of flannel and coarse grey cloth, affording employment to about forty persons. A new road has been lately made to Aberystwith, and the enclosure of the waste land within the borough will, it is expected, add to the prosperity of the town, which is already considered in a flourishing state, and is one of the best in the county. The principal market is on Wednesday, and a smaller market, chiefly for butchers' meat and other provisions, is held on Saturday: here are also held great cattle markets, on the four Wednesdays next after Old May day (May 12th.) The fairs are on August 6th and 27th, September 26th, October 14th, and December 3rd.

This place is a borough by prescription, and a bailiff is annually elected from among the resident burgesses at Michaelmas, at the court leet of the manor, which belongs to the crown; but he has no magisterial authority, and his power is confined to the receipt of tolls, under the authority of the bailiff of the borough of New Radnor. The burgesses are appointed by a town jury, and presented at the annual court leet: they have scarcely any other privilege than exemption from toll. Rhaiadr is one of the contributory boroughs which, with New Radnor, jointly return one member to parliament: the franchise was conferred by the 27th of Henry VIII., and was confirmed by a determination of the House of Commons in 1690. The right of election has heretofore been vested in the burgesses generally, whether resident or not; the number of whom cannot be ascertained, many having omitted to enrol themselves after presentation, in order to avoid paying the customary fees. It is now, by the late act for amending the representation, in the resident burgesses only, if duly qualified according to its provisions, and in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act directs: the number of tenements of this value within the limits of the borough, which have been extended, in order to include the village of Llansantfraid Cwm-toyddwr, forming a suburb on the opposite bank of the Wye, and are minutely described in the Appendix, is forty-five. The steward of the manor holds a court baron, once in every three weeks, for the recovery of debts under forty shillings. The town-hall is a commodious building, erected by public subscription in 1762, and situated in the centre of the town:

the upper part contains rooms well adapted for the holding of the courts, and underneath it is an area in which the market is held. The site of the ancient prison is now partly occupied by a dissenting meeting-house; and the place for the execution of criminals, when the assizes were held here, was at the north end of the town, near a house called Pen y Maes. By the late Boundary Act, this has been made one of the polling-places in the election of a knight for the shire.

Rhaiadr anciently formed part of the parish of Nantmel, from which it was severed, and was erected into a parish of itself, co-extensive with the borough, about the year 1735, when the first churchwarden was appointed. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with half the tithes, and with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Nantmel. The church, dedicated to St. Bridget, or, according to some writers, to St. Clement, was rebuilt in 1733, and a low square embattled tower was added in 1783: the present structure is neat and substantially built, and consists of a nave and chancel: it was thoroughly repaired in 1829, when a gallery, containing eighty free sittings, was erected at the west end by public subscription, aided by a grant of £30 from the Incorporated Society for building and enlarging churches and chapels. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A grammar school, originally founded by an unknown benefactor, and which had been suffered to fall into disuse, was revived about the close of the last century, and a school-house adjoining the churchyard was erected by public subscription, in 1793, in which six boys of this parish, and six of the adjoining parish of Cwm-toyddwr, receive gratuitous education. The present endowment arises from the rents of two estates bequeathed by Mr. Charles Price, subject to an annual charge of fifty shillings for five divinity lectures, and now producing about £50 per annum; from a rent-charge of £3 on lands in this parish; and from the rent of a tenement in the parish of Disserth, left by Mr. Daniel Davis, and now producing £8 per annum. Previously to the establishment of the college of St. David's at Lampeter, in the county of Cardigan, candidates for holy orders were ordained from this school. Sunday schools are also supported by subscription, in connexion with the established church and the several dissenting congregations. The Rev. Henry Williams, in 1810, bequeathed £2000 in the three per cent. consolidated annuities, for the endowment of lectures in divinity, to be delivered in the parish church: the lecturer is appointed by the Chancellor and Scholars of the University of Oxford, preference being given to the nearest of kin to the founder, and is to forfeit, for every omission, ten shillings to the poor. The same gentleman left also the interest of £200 in the same stock for the clerk. A lending library, consisting of one hundred and twenty volumes, chiefly on divinity, was given to the clergy of this district, in 1810, by the associates of the late Dr. Bray. There are now no vestiges of the castle of Rhaiadr, except the fosse, which is partly filled up with fragments of rock: the site of the tower or citadel is indicated by a mount overlooking the river Wye, which is still called Tower Mount. The river, which on the west flowed immediately under its walls, was, by means of a deep trench cut in the solid rock, made upon cases of emergency to surround the fortress. Here was also a religious house belonging to the Dominicans, or Black friars, situated near the bridge, and which may probably have been a cell to the abbey of Strata Florida, at no great distance, in the adjacent county of Cardigan. In the vicinity of the town are several cairns and barrows, the most remarkable of which is a small mound called Tommen Sant Fraid, surrounded by cottages, and said to have communicated, by means of a subterraneous passage, with the castle, and also with an encampment on the opposite side of the river, in the parish of Cwm-toyddwr. The Rev. Henry Williams, founder of the divinity lectures, was buried in the churchyard of this parish. The poor are maintained by an average annual expenditure amounting to £165. 12.

RHANDIR-ABBOT, a hamlet in the parish of LLANVAIR AR Y BRÛN, higher division of the hundred of PERVETH, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (N.) from Llandovery, containing 401 inhabitants. It is situated on the eastern bank of the Towy, and at the foot of a mountain in which are extensive lead mines belonging to Earl Cawdor, the working of which is now discontinued. The chapel of Nant y Bai is in this hamlet, having been re-erected here, instead of at Ystrad Fin, where the original building stood. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Earl Cawdor. Nearly opposite Earl Cawdor's mansion of Nant y Mwyn, where the banks of the river are somewhat precipitous, there is a picturesque foot bridge across the Towy, leading to Pwll Pradog. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £118. 16.

RHANDIR-CANOL, a hamlet in the parish of LLANVAIR AR Y BRÛN, higher division of the hundred of PERVETH, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 5½ miles (N.E.) from Llandovery, containing 318 inhabitants. It forms, as the name implies, the middle division of the parish, and is situated on the left bank of the river Towy. There is a separate assessment for the support of the poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £113. 7.

RHANDIR-ISÂV, a hamlet in the parish of LLANVAIR AR Y BRÛN, higher division of the hundred of PERVETH, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (N.E. by N.) from Llandovery, containing 475 inhabitants. The romantic river Brân flows through it, and has a few pleasing residences on its banks, the principal of which is Glân Brân, the beautiful seat of Col. Gwynne. This hamlet is well wooded, and the road from Llandovery to Builth here passes along the left bank of the river, and through the park of Glân Brân. The poor are maintained by a separate assessment, the average annual expenditure amounting to £185. 15.

RHANDIR-ÛCHÂV, a hamlet in the parish of LLANVAIR AR Y BRÛN, higher division of the hundred of PERVETH, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (N.E.) from Llandovery, containing 291 inhabitants. It is situated in a mountainous district, near the source of the river Brân, on the border of Brecknockshire. A separate assessment is made for the support of the poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £122. 3.

RHIGOS (RHEGOES), a hamlet in the parish of YSTRADDYVODOG, hundred of MISKIN, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 7½ miles (W.) from Merthyr-Tydvil, containing 505 inhabitants, the population having increased about thirty per cent. since the census of 1821. It is situated on the border of Brecknockshire, near the Hirwaun iron-works, and on the road from Neath to Merthyr-Tydvil. Hirwaun common is a high and extensive tract to the west of this place, and contains some coal-pits, from which tram-roads proceed to the Hirwaun works in Brecknockshire. A separate assessment is made for the maintenance of the poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £104.

RHIW, a parish in the hundred of COMMITMAEN, Lleyn division of the county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 11 miles (W.S.W.) from Pwllheli, containing 358 inhabitants. This place derives its name, signifying the ascent of a hill, from its situation on the acclivity of Mynydd Rhiw, a lofty eminence which rises above the village to an elevation of one thousand and thirteen feet above the level of the sea. The parish, which extends across the isthmus of Lleyn, is situated on the western shore of the bay called Porthnigel, in the great bay of Cardigan, and comprises a considerable portion of arable and pasture land, of which about two-thirds are ancient enclosure, and the remainder, which is mountainous, was enclosed by an act for that purpose, in the year 1811. The soil, in the lower grounds, is a stiff clay, and in the higher lands gravelly, producing fine crops of barley and oats, and excellent grass; and the enclosed commons afford good pasturage for sheep and young cattle. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, and is somewhat enlivened by several small rivulets, which run through the parish. From the summit of Mynydd Rhiw the prospect is strikingly beautiful, embracing the whole range of the mountains of Snowdon, and extending over Cardigan bay, St. George's channel, and a great part of South Wales. Plâs Rhiw, for many generations the seat of the family of Lewis, and now the property and residence of Lewis Moor Bennet, Esq., is an ancient and handsome mansion, pleasantly situated, and comprehending within the grounds some pleasing and picturesque scenery. Manganese, of very superior quality, abounds in the parish: the vein in which it lies was first discovered in 1827, and has been worked since that time with very great success: about fifty persons are now employed in procuring it, the produce being principally sent to the Liverpool market. The living is a rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Llandudwen annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £6. 14. 9½., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Aelrhiw, is an ancient and spacious cruciform structure, in the early style of English architecture, and is in good repair. There is a place of worship for Independents, with a burial-ground attached. A school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children is held every fourth year in this parish, in rotation with that of BrÛncroes, in which the tenement is situated which forms the endowment, and those of Aberdaron and LlanvaelrhÛs. Some land in the parish, now producing £4 per annum, was bequeathed for keeping the church in repair.

The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £111. 4.

RHIW-LLÂS (RHIWLAS), a joint hamlet with Tach-Lleuan, in that part of the parish of LLANDILO-VAWR which is in the lower division of the hundred of CAYO, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (N. N. W.) from Llandilo-Vawr. The population is returned with the hamlet of Tach-Lleuan, with which it is conjointly assessed for the maintenance of its poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £97. 1.

RHODOGEIDIO, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES.—See CEIDIO.

RHÔSBEIRIO, or RHÔS-PEIRIO (RHÔS-BEIRIO), a parish in the hundred of TWRCELYN, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (W. by S.) from Amlwch, containing 32 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the shore of the Irish sea, is of very limited extent, and comprises only a small portion of arable and pasture land, which is in a tolerable state of cultivation. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llanellian, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Peirio, from whom the parish derives its name, is a small ancient structure, supposed to have been originally built about the year 605, and is situated in the centre of a level field, at some distance from the village: divine service is performed in it only every third Sunday.

RHÔSCOLYN, a parish in the hundred of MENAI, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (S. S. E.) from Holyhead, containing 495 inhabitants. The name of this parish is, by the author of the "Mona Antiqua Restaurata," derived from one of those columns which the Romans erected, both as commemorative of their victories, and to mark the extent of their conquests. The same author states that Gwenvaen, daughter of Pawl hên, had a religious house or cloister in this place, from which afterwards originated the parish church, called, from the original founder of that establishment, Llan-wenvaen, or "the church of Gwenvaen," an appellation which for some time superseded its original name of Rhôscolyn, or "the Moor of the Column." The site of the ancient cloister is still distinguishable by the number of human bones found whenever the ground is turned up by the spade or the plough. The parish forms the southern half of Holy Island, being connected with that of Holyhead, which forms the other half, by a narrow isthmus, along which runs the old London road to that place, and separated from the western coast of the main land of Anglesey only by a narrow, shallow, and sandy strait: its surface is chiefly cultivated, though much of it is rendered of poor quality by rocks and sands. Near Bodior, an ancient mansion in this parish, is found in great abundance the beautiful variegated marble called verd antique, of which the specimens obtained here, in the diversity and brilliancy of the colours, surpass those of Italy; and in the same quarries are found veins of beautiful asbestos, of soft silky texture, and of very superior quality. The living is a discharged rectory, with Llanvair-yn-Eubwll and Llanvihangel-yn-howyn annexed, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £10. 5., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Gwenvaen, is a small edifice, supposed originally to have been erected about the year 630, and not distinguished by any remarkable architectural features. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Some small charitable donations and bequests have been made for apprenticing poor children, and for distribution among the poor. An average annual expenditure amounting to £205. 17. is applied to the support of the poor.

RHÔSCROWTHER (RHÔS Y CRYTHOR), a parish in the hundred of CASTLEMARTIN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (W.) from Pembroke, containing 231 inhabitants. This place is said to have been anciently the residence of some of the Welsh princes, prior to the Norman conquest; and there is still a place called Estington, supposed to be a corruption of "Iestyn's-ton," which was probably their abode. The parish is situated near the shores of Milford Haven, and is partly bounded on the north by Nangle bay: it comprises a large tract of good arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and in excellent cultivation; and the inhabitants are chiefly employed in agriculture. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied, and the views over the haven and St. George's channel are interesting, and enlivened by the passing and repassing of vessels. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £15. 12. 11., and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Decumanus, is a venerable structure of very great antiquity, in the early style of English architecture, but is not distinguished by any remarkable architectural details. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £136. 7.

RHÔSDIAU (RHÔS-DDŪ), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of LLAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (S. by E.) from Aberystwith, containing 152 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated within a few miles of Cardigan bay, is of very small extent. The surface is varied, and in some part mountainous; and the surrounding scenery is characterized rather by features of rugged boldness than of pleasing or picturesque appearance: the soil in the lower grounds is productive, and the declivities of the hills afford scanty pasturage for sheep and young cattle. Its distance from any great turnpike road renders this place difficult of access, and it has therefore little intercourse, even with the neighbouring places. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £1. 6. 8., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, having for some time been in a state of ruinous dilapidation, was rebuilt in 1816. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £25. 8.

RHÔSGÔCH (RHÔS-GÔCH), a township forming a part of the chapelry of Wolston, in that part of the parish of WORTHEN which is in the lower division of the hundred of CAWRSE, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles (E.) from Welshpool, containing 59 inhabitants. It forms a part of the Long Mountain, on the border of Shropshire, in which county the greater portion of the parish is situated. The poor are maintained by a separate assessment, the average annual expenditure amounting to £26. 14.

RHÔSILLY, or ROSILLY (RHÔS-SULWY), a parish in the hundred of SWANSEA, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $16\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. S. W.) from Swansea, containing 302 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from Reginald Sili, or Sulwy, to whom the lordship was given, in the division of the conquered territory of Glamorgan, by Fitz-Hamon. It is situated on a bay to which it gives name, in the Bristol channel, and which is enclosed on the south by Worms Head, a small promontory forming the western extremity of the county of Glamorgan, and stretching two miles into the sea, and on the north by the promontory opposite to which Holme's island is situated. The anchorage in this bay is considered very dangerous, except in fine weather, from the eddies and currents which set in here strongly at other times. The limestone rocks which line the shore exhibit some very curious caverns, in which are fine specimens of stalactite; and the sands, which extend for three miles to the north-west of the church, are firm and smooth, affording a pleasant marine walk. The parish comprises an extensive tract of land, of which about three-fourths are enclosed and cultivated, and the remainder consists of fine open downs, affording excellent pasturage, and other common and waste land. Several of the inhabitants are employed in quarrying limestone, of which great quantities are shipped from the bay to different parts of the principality. The surrounding scenery is agreeably diversified, and the views over the bay and the adjacent country abound with objects of interest and with features of pleasing character. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £9. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is an ancient structure, situated near the shore, but is not remarkable for its architectural details. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £40. 11.

RHÔS-MAEN, a joint hamlet with Tir-Esgob, in that part of the parish of LLANDILO-VAWR which is in the lower division of the hundred of PERVETH, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (N. E.) from Llandilo-Vawr. The population is included in the return for Tir-Esgob. It lies on the right bank of the river Towy, and the road from Llandilo-Vawr to Llangadock passes through it.

RHÔSMARKET (RHÔS-MARKET), a parish in the hundred of RHÔS, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (E. N. E.) from Milford, containing 456 inhabitants. This parish comprises a moderate extent of arable and pasture land, of which the whole is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation; the surface is undulated, and in some parts hilly. Its situation, about half-way between Haverfordwest and Milford, affords great facility for conveying to market its agricultural produce. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The vicar, in addition to the small tithes, has the tithe of hay. The church, dedicated to St. Ishmael, is not distinguished by any architectural details of importance. In the village are the remains of an ancient mansion, formerly the seat of the family of Walters, in which was born Lucy, daughter of Sir Richard Walters, the favourite mistress of Charles II., and mother of the unfortunate Duke of Monmouth: the ruins are now the property of Mrs. Owen Barlow, who is the principal proprietor of land in the parish. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £110. 10.

RHÔSVERRIG (RHÔS-VEIRIG), a hamlet in the parish of LLANVIHANGEL-BRYN-PABUAN, hundred of BUILTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (N. W.) from Builth, containing 112 inhabitants. This hamlet takes its name, though situated on the western bank of the Wye, from the ancient Verreg, or Verlex, an extensive district between the rivers Wye and Severn, frequently referred to by the Welsh historians as having been governed by its own reguli: it anciently contained a mansion belonging to Elystan Glodrydd, one of the five royal tribes, whose descendant still inherits the principal portion of this division of the parish. The river Wye bounds it on the north-east, and the Whevri stream on the south-west; and between these it forms a narrow peninsula, running in a south-easterly direction almost to the town of Builth. It is the most fertile portion of the district, having a soil composed chiefly of loam, though intermixed with some gravel; and the crops are more abundant and varied than those of the remainder of the parish. The Radnorshire trap rocks extend for a short distance on the banks of the Wye, at its eastern extremity, where, on the tenement of Parc ar Irvon, near Parc wood, are three mineral springs, close to each other, one saline, another sulphureous, and the third chalybeate. The waters of the saline spring are stronger than perhaps any other in the kingdom, but the sulphureous spring has a weaker impregnation than that at Llanwrtyd. The wells are covered with a small and neat pump-room. Near them is a small projecting rock, overhanging the Wye, which was once fortified, and probably served as a post for guarding the ford of Llêchryd: it may even have been at one period occupied by the Romans, as the Roman road from Llandrindod must have crossed the Wye near this spot. The Whevri is remarkable for the abundance and excellence of its trout. A separate assessment is made for the maintenance of the poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £24. 13.

RHUDDLAN, a borough, sea-port, and parish, partly in the hundred of PRESTATYN, and partly in that of RHUDDLAN, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 11 miles (W. by N.) from Holywell, 16 (W. by N.) from Flint, 21 (N. W. by W.) from Mold, and 220 (N. W.) from London, containing, with the chapelry of Rhyl, 1506 inhabitants. The name of this place, which is of very great antiquity, is supposed to be derived from the red colour of the soil on the banks of the river Clwyd, on which it is situated. The town appears to have been of considerable importance from the earliest period; and the adjoining marsh, called by the Welsh "Morva Rhuddlan," is distinguished as the scene of a memorable and sanguinary battle which took place in the year 795, between the Saxons under Offa, King of Mercia, and the Welsh, in which the latter, after a severe and obstinate conflict, were defeated with dreadful slaughter.

ter, and Caradoc, King of North Wales, with many of his principal chieftains, was slain. Such of the Welsh as escaped the sword of the enemy perished in the marsh from the influx of the tide; and all who had been taken prisoners were inhumanly massacred, without much regard to age or sex. In commemoration of this disastrous event was composed the well-known Welsh air of "Morva Rhuddlan," which is so deservedly admired for the plaintive sweetness of its melody. According to the Welsh Chronicles, it would appear that Offa himself fell in this engagement, but the Saxon annals place his death a year earlier. In 1015, Llewelyn ab Sytysyllt, King of North Wales, erected a fortress and a palace at Rhuddlan, which he made his principal residence, and which, after his death by assassination, in 1021, continued to be that of his son and successor, Gruffydd ab Llewelyn. This prince, having given offence to Edward the Confessor, King of England, by sheltering Algar Earl of Chester, one of his refractory nobles, that monarch sent Harold, with a powerful force, to subdue his dominions; and Gruffydd, surprised at this place by the sudden approach of the English army, which he was not prepared to oppose, privately embarked with a few of his attendants in one of the vessels then lying in the harbour, and, setting sail immediately, effected his escape. Harold soon made himself master of the fortress, and, mortified at the unexpected escape of the Welsh king, burnt his palace and destroyed all the ships of war and other vessels remaining in the harbour, after which he returned into England, to make more extensive preparations. Towards the end of the Confessor's reign, Rhuddlan appears to have been possessed by Edwin Earl of Chester.

The castle was afterwards held by the Welsh, who appear to have retained possession of it for some time, during which they rebuilt and fortified the town, and rendered it one of the most flourishing places in North Wales. In 1098, Robert, nephew of Hugh Lupus, Earl of Chester, laid siege to this place, and compelled the garrison to surrender. William the Conqueror, perceiving the advantageous situation of Rhuddlan near to the sea, and its importance as a border fortress, issued orders to Robert, surnamed from this place "de Rotelan," to repair the castle, to strengthen the fortifications of the town, and to make it his principal residence; and the square towers still standing, evidently of Norman origin, were probably erected at this time, and in obedience to the royal mandate. The additional works raised by this nobleman, with the facility of obtaining by sea supplies of men and provisions at any time from England, rendered it a military station of great importance, and a powerful means of keeping the Welsh in subjection. In 1109, Gruffydd ab Cynan, who had previously visited Robert at this place, and had obtained from him assistance against his enemies, in consequence of some quarrel which had arisen between them, attacked the castle of Rhuddlan, burnt the outer ward, killed many of the garrison, and compelled the remainder to retire for safety within the towers. Henry II., on his invasion of North Wales, in 1157, advanced to Rhuddlan without any resistance, repaired the castle, and strengthened the fortifications with additional works, and, previously to his return into England, garrisoned it with a strong body of his own forces. The Welsh chieftains having, in 1165, entered into a confederacy to throw off the allegiance which they had sworn to this monarch, Henry, aware of the importance of this castle as a grand border fortress, and judging that it would be the first object of their attack, advanced hastily to protect it; but the enemy retiring upon his approach, the king, not being in sufficient force to pursue them, remained at this place only for a few days, and, having reinforced the garrison, returned to England. The castle, notwithstanding its strength and the number of the garrison, being invested by the Welsh forces in 1167, though valiantly defended, was taken, after a siege of two months, by Owain Gwynedd, sovereign of North Wales, who dismantled the fortifications, and put the garrison to the sword. It appears, however, to have been soon restored by the English, for it is named in conjunction with two other fortresses given by Henry II. to Davydd, son of Owain Gwynedd, on his marriage with Emma, natural sister of that monarch; and, in 1178, it was held for him by an English garrison, in opposition to a body of his own subjects, who had risen in disgust at his tyrannical conduct. In 1187, Baldwin, Archbishop of Canterbury, attended by Giraldus Cambrensis, in his progress through Wales to preach the crusades, was hospitably received and nobly entertained by Davydd, in his castle of Rhuddlan, which this prince probably at a subsequent period surrendered to the English, in whose possession it for some time remained.

Towards the close of the reign of Richard I., Ranulph de Meschines, surnamed Blundeville, Earl of Chester, being suddenly besieged in this fortress by a body of Welsh, at a time when the garrison was quite inadequate to its defence, was reduced to a state of extreme peril, from which he was at length relieved by his lieutenant, Roger de Lacy, who, with great promptitude, assembling a vast number of idle persons, and vagabonds of all descriptions, who had congregated at the fair of Chester, placed himself at their head, and marched towards Rhuddlan. Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, who had succeeded Davydd in the principality of North Wales, and commanded the besieging forces in person, perceiving at a distance an immense crowd of people, imagined it to be an English army advancing to the relief of the castle, and immediately raised the siege and retired with precipitation. The earl, in gratitude for the timely assistance, conferred upon his lieutenant the "magisterium omnium peccatorum et meretricum totius Cestreshire," which grant was, by one of his sons, partially assigned to his steward, Hugh Dutton, his heirs and assigns, whose descendants, in the reign of Henry VII., preferred their claim, in right of this grant, to an annual payment of fourpence from every woman of ill fame within the county of Chester, and to the power of summoning all minstrels exercising their calling within the said county, to appear, annually on the festival of St. John the Baptist, before themselves or their stewards, and to present each a lance, four flagons of wine, and fourpence halfpenny, as the price of their licences. These claims, being annexed to certain estates, continued to descend with them for a series of ages, and the annual procession of the minstrels to the church of St. John the Baptist at Chester was continued till the middle of the last century. King John, on his invasion of North Wales, in 1211, advanced through Rhuddlan into Carnarvonshire. In the following year the castle was attacked, but without effect, by Prince Llewelyn, who, however, succeeded in capturing it in 1214. From this time it appears to have been alternately in the possession of the English and the Welsh, till the year 1277, when it was finally wrested from the latter by Edward I., who, fully aware of the importance of its occupation, in the prosecution of his schemes of conquest, made it the principal rendezvous for the forces which he had assembled for the subjugation of Wales. It likewise formed the grand depôt of arms and provisions for the supply of his invading army. Edward, having strongly fortified the place, took up his residence at Rhuddlan, while conducting the conquest of the country, and here entered into a treaty with Llewelyn, who submitted himself almost entirely to his mercy, consented to repair hither to take the oath of fealty to him, and paid him the sum of two thousand marks.

Anian, prior of the monastery of Rhuddlan, having been elected to the see of St. Asaph, in 1268, petitioned Edward, about the year 1282, after the seat of his diocese had been in a great measure destroyed by the contending armies, to remove the episcopal chair to Rhuddlan, as a place of safety, where the bishops and the church might, under shelter of the strong castle there, be protected from the furious attacks of both parties, to which they still continued exposed. This the English king would willingly have done, having even made an offer of land here, on which to build a new cathedral church, together with a thousand marks to defray the expense of its erection; but the consent of the pontiff was never obtained, and the cathedral was at length rebuilt on its former site. Llewelyn, however, repenting of the submission he had made to the English monarch, and aware of the danger of leaving so important a place in the hands of his enemy, in conjunction with his brother Davydd, whom a sense of the common danger had reconciled to his cause, captured all the fortresses of the English in North Wales, except the castle of Rhuddlan, which he at length invested, and slew all the workmen engaged in strengthening the fortifications. Edward, relying on the strength of this fortress, and making every preparation for the final subjugation of the Welsh, immediately issued summonses from Worcester, commanding that all his military tenants, including the military services of the prelates, and of the twenty-four abbots holding of the crown, should meet him at Rhuddlan in the ensuing month of June, 1282. On the approach of Edward, about the middle of this month, the Welsh princes raised the siege; and in the following month, the English monarch, during his residence here, issued orders to the sheriffs of the adjacent border counties to raise each a certain number of hatchet men, to act as pioneers for the safe passage of his army into the interior. From this place, too, it was that the ineffectual negotiations between Edward and the Welsh princes, through the medium of the Archbishop of Canterbury, were carried on; but all conferences being at length broken off, Edward advanced, in the beginning of November, from Rhuddlan to Aberconway, but returned on the 24th of the same month, after the defeat of a body of his forces near Bangor, and hence issued writs for assembling a parliament to grant extraordinary supplies for the maintenance of the war. After the unfortunate death of Llewelyn, in the following winter, and the entire dispersion of the Welsh forces, his brother Davydd, with his wife, two sons, and seven daughters, was brought prisoner to Rhuddlan, where the English king had now taken up his residence to settle the affairs of his newly conquered territories: after being kept for some time a close prisoner in the castle, he was removed in chains to Shrewsbury, and was there ignominiously put to death as a traitor.

During his residence at Rhuddlan, Edward instituted the celebrated body of laws, for the government of his new subjects, called "the statute of Rhuddlan," which introduced the English system of judicature into the extensive territories which, on account of their remote situation, had escaped the usurpation of the lords marcher; and he likewise issued from this place a proclamation to all the inhabitants of Wales, that he would receive them under his protection, and assure to them the enjoyment of their liberties and estates under the same tenures as they had heretofore held them of their native princes. It was here also that Edward, while sitting in council, at which the Welsh chieftains attended, promised to them for their sovereign a native of their own country, one who knew not how to speak a word of English, and whose life and conduct had been hitherto irreproachable. On their acclamations of joy, and promise of obedience, he invested with the principality his infant son Edward, who had just been born in the castle of Carnarvon. Edward, in order to guard Rhuddlan against any future attempts of the Welsh, resolved upon rebuilding the castle, and rendering it impregnable by the strength of its fortifications; and more than fifteen years were employed in the accomplishment of this work, which was conducted on a scale of splendour and magnificence, of which striking evidence is preserved in its present stately ruins. Although not completed during Edward's sojourn here, this monarch's second child, the princess Eleanor, was born in the castle. In the mean time the town rapidly increased in population and importance: it was principally inhabited by English settlers, and soon became the chief town in this part of the principality. The inhabitants had been invested with many privileges by Hugh Lupus, Earl of Chester; and the number of burgesses, which in his time amounted only to eight, was extended to eighteen by Robert de Rotelan, who augmented their privileges, making them equal to those enjoyed by the men of Hereford. By a writ issued by Edward from Bristol, in 1284, the inhabitants of Rhuddlan, in common with those of some other Welsh towns, were declared to be free for ever from paying the taxes called talliages; and by a charter dated at Flint; on September 8th of the same year, in the 12th of his reign, the same monarch made this place a free borough, ordaining that the constable of the castle should be mayor, to be assisted by two bailiffs, chosen annually from the burgesses, and by other municipal officers. He granted the corporation also a guild; a prison, with power to hold courts for determining all offences not extending to life or limb; a forest and free warren; and numerous other privileges and immunities, all which were subsequently confirmed by Richard II., at Leicester, and again by the same monarch at Westminster.

Sir Gruffydd Llwyd, who had received from Edward I. the honour of knighthood, on bringing to that monarch tidings of the birth of his son at Carnarvon, rebelling against Edward II., assembled a large number of native troops in 1322, and assaulted the castle of this place; but, after many fruitless attempts to reduce it, he was taken prisoner, and, after being confined here for some time, was executed. Rhuddlan castle was granted by Edward III., in the seventh year of his reign, to his son Edward the Black Prince, as forming part of the earldom of Chester; and, according to a survey of the revenues of that earldom, made about forty years after this time, it appears that the town of Rhuddlan paid to the Earls of Chester a chief-rent of £72. 9. 2. per annum, and that the emoluments of the constable of the castle, who was accountable for the payment of that rent, amounted to £8. 14. per annum. On the return of Richard II. from his expedition into Ireland, whence he was recalled by the distracted state of his government at home, that monarch was brought to this town by the Earl of Northumberland and a large body of retainers, by whom he was held in a state of honourable captivity; and having staid here for a short time, for the purpose of refreshment, he was hurried forward by that nobleman to the castle of Flint, where he was betrayed into the power of his rival Bolingbroke, afterwards Henry IV. From this time little is recorded of the history of the castle, which appears to have fallen into neglect, and to have become dilapidated; for, on the breaking out of the parliamentary war, a very great expense was incurred in putting it in proper condition for receiving the troops by which it was garrisoned for the king. In 1645 it was besieged by a powerful body of parliamentary forces, under the command of Sir William Brereton: the garrison made a valiant and successful defence, and Sir William, after many fruitless efforts to reduce it, was compelled to retire to Chester. In the following year the castle was besieged by General Mytton, to whom it surrendered, and it was soon afterwards dismantled by order of the parliament.

The town, now comparatively little more than a village, is pleasantly situated in an extensive vale, on the east bank of the river Clwyd, and about two miles above its influx into the Irish sea: it consists principally of one good street, intersected by several smaller thoroughfares: the houses are neatly built, the streets indifferently and only partially paved, and the inhabitants but scantily supplied with water, which, in dry seasons, they are frequently obliged to bring from a spot a mile distant. Over the river Clwyd, which empties itself into the bay of Llandulas, is an ancient bridge of two arches, built in the year 1595, by William Hughes, Bishop of St. Asaph, near which the tide formerly rose to a sufficient height to enable boats of seven tons' burden, or "flats," as they are here called, to approach the town; but great improvements have in later times been made in the navigation of this river. Among these may be more particularly noticed an extensive embankment, raised at the expense of the land-holders, by which the river is prevented from inundating the contiguous grounds, and much valuable land has been gained. A commodious harbour has also been formed, which is accessible at all states of the tide for vessels of one hundred tons' burden. Spacious quays and wharfs have been constructed, and warehouses erected, for facilitating the trade of the place, which has become a central dépôt for supplying the several towns in the Vale of Clwyd and the adjacent parts of North Wales. The principal trade of the port consists in the exportation of grain and timber, of which great quantities are shipped to Liverpool and the neighbouring ports, and of lead-ore from the adjacent mines of Talar gôch; and in the importation of coal, groceries, and shop goods of various descriptions, to be distributed hence throughout the surrounding country by land carriage. The port is formed by the mouth of the Clwyd, at a place called the Voryd, or "Sea Ford." A steam-packet plies regularly between this place and Liverpool, and brigs and sloops sail frequently both to that and other neighbouring ports: the old turnpike road from Holywell to Abergele passes through the town. Rhyl, in this parish, has of late years risen into repute as a bathing-place, and is much frequented by visitors during the summer, for whose accommodation two hotels have been erected: for a more detailed account see the article on that place. Fairs are held annually at Rhuddlan on February 2nd, March 25th, and September 8th.

The charter granted by Edward I., and confirmed by Richard II., has been in disuse ever since the period when the castle was dismantled by order of the parliament, no constable having since been appointed, and consequently the borough has had no mayor: the appointment of the bailiffs, which is vested in the lord of the manor, still annually takes place. The corporation no longer exercise any magisterial authority: the courts formerly held under their charter have been discontinued, those now held being only the courts baron and leet of the lord of the manor, at the latter of which, held annually in October, the borough officers are chosen. Though reduced in extent and importance, this place still retains its privilege, as one of the parliamentary boroughs within the county, of contributing in the return of one member to parliament: the right of election is in all the inhabitants paying scot and lot within the limits of Rhuddlan franchise, which extends over five townships of the parish of Rhuddlan, a great part of that of St. Asaph, and portions of those of Cwm and Dyserth: the present number of electors is about one hundred and eighty. The limits of the borough remain unaltered by the recent measures to amend the representation: although so extensive, they comprise only thirty-three houses of the yearly value of £10, twenty-three of which are situated in the town. Rhuddlan is now one of the polling-places in the election of a knight for the shire.

The living is a vicarage, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese, of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £11. 10. 5., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The great tithes of the parish were granted by Edward I. to the Dean and Chapter of St. Asaph, in 1284, and are now the principal source of revenue belonging to that body. A good glebe house was erected about twelve years ago. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is an ancient structure, partly in the early style of English architecture, consisting of a nave, chancel, and north aisle, and containing some interesting monuments to the family of Bôdryddan, especially one of white marble, erected to the memory of the very Rev. W. D. Shipley, Dean of St. Asaph, who was buried in an elegant mausoleum adjoining, which was erected by himself during his life. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, the two latter having also places of worship at Rhyl. Through the exertions of the present vicar, the Rev. Thomas Wynne Edwards, a National school was established here, in 1829, by subscription, aided by a grant of £50 from the parent society in London: the building is capable of receiving one hundred and forty boys, and there are at present ninety-five boys who are gratuitously instructed in reading, writing, and arithmetic. A similar institution for girls has also been established, and is entirely supported by Lady Mostyn, of Pengwern, and Mrs. Yonge, of Bôdryddan. There are various charitable donations and bequests, the produce of which is annually distributed among the poor of the parish. The ancient castle occupied an elevated site on the bank of the river Clwyd, commanding the harbour and the pass above Morva Rhuddlan: the walls enclosed an octagonal area, and were defended by six round towers of great strength, of which those at the east and west angles were double, and those at the north and south were single: the steep acclivity towards the river was defended with high walls and square towers, and the whole was surrounded by a broad and deep fosse, faced with stone. This fortress was built of limestone, freestone, and red sand-stone, and of its original splendour and magnificence a striking memorial is preserved in its venerable and stately ruins, which are among the most interesting and extensive in the principality. They consist chiefly of the walls, which are seventeen feet in thickness, and on the south side nearly entire; three of the round towers, of which one called Twr y Brenhin, or "the king's tower," is in tolerable preservation; the remains of various state apartments within the area, in one of which it is said the princess Eleanor was born; one of the square towers which defended the acclivity from the river, which is still entire; and the ruins of another, called "Twr y Silod." To the south of the castle there is an artificial mound, called Toothill, surrounded by a deep fosse, and once probably the site of the fort and palace built by Llewelyn ab Sytstyt, and destroyed by Harold; the fosse comprises a quadrilateral area, in which was also anciently included the priory of Rhuddlan.

The priory was founded in the year 1197, by Ranulph de Blundeville, Earl of Chester, for brethren of the Dominican order; and in 1268, Anian de Schonon, prior, was made Bishop of St. Asaph. The establishment suffered greatly during the wars of Edward I., but it still continued to flourish till the dissolution, when its revenue was estimated at £197. 19. 10.: the site and buildings were granted, in the 32nd of Henry VIII., to Harry ab Harry. The remains, now converted into a farm-house and stables, consist chiefly of some part of the dormitory and domestic apartments, which are tolerably perfect. Many stone coffins have been dug up on the site of the ancient buildings, which appear to have been very extensive; and among the monumental stones found near the spot is one to the memory of Anian de Schonon, on which is his effigy, holding the crosier in the left hand, the right hand raised as if in the act of benediction, and the head crowned with a mitre: this stone is now built up in the wall of a barn. In the cemetery many human skeletons have been discovered, and numbers of human bones are yet frequently thrown up by the spade. Not far distant from the priory stands a farm-house called Spital, or "Ysputti," formerly a hospital belonging to the Knights Templar, founded by Edward I., in 1279; and near it is a fine spring, from which the priory was supplied with water conveyed to it by leaden pipes, which were taken up only a few years ago: from this spring the town of Rhuddlan is now supplied during seasons of drought. On the east side of the principal street is still remaining a portion of the house in which Edward I. sate in council, while superintending the building of the castle, and legislating for the future government of his Welsh subjects. In commemoration of this circumstance, a stone was placed in the building by the late very Rev. W. D. Shipley, M.A. Dean of St. Asaph, with the following inscription:—"This fragment is the remains of the building where King Edward I. held his parliament, A.D. 1283, in which was passed the statute of Rhuddlan, securing to the principality of Wales its judicial rights and independence." About a mile from the town, in the hamlet of Cricin, there is a large tumulus, heaped over the remains of St. Eurgain, or Cain, daughter of Maelgwyn, and niece of St. Asaph, founder of the see of that name: on the tumulus is the shaft of a cross, the head of which is now in a pool on the farm adjoining. Bôdryddan, in this parish, has been the property and residence of the family of Conway from the time of Edward III., by whom it was granted to John Coniers of Conway, at that time governor of Calais, and to whom also belong the castle and manor of Rhuddlan, by a grant from Edward the Black Prince. The mansion is spacious; and the grounds, which are very extensive, are enriched with some of the finest timber in North Wales. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £564. 13.

RHWNGDWY - CLYDACH (RHWNG - DWY GLYDACH), HIGHER, a hamlet in the parish and hundred of LLANGYVELACH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (N. by E.) from Swansea, containing 252 inhabitants. This place, the name of which denotes its situation between the Upper and Lower Clydach rivers, contains several respectable residences, in some instances embosomed in wood. The poor are maintained by a separate assessment, at an average annual expense of £82. 12.

RHWNGDWY - CLYDACH (RHWNG - DWY GLYDACH), LOWER, a hamlet in the parish and hundred of LLANGYVELACH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (N. by E.) from Swansea, containing 885 inhabitants. It is situated, as its name imports, between the Lower and Upper Clydach rivers. Here are coal-pits, with a railway to the Swansea canal, which here passes along the right bank of the river Tawy. The poor are maintained by a separate assessment, the average annual expenditure amounting to £186. 12.

RHÛDERIN (RHÛD-YR-HIN), a township in the parish of LLANEGRIN, hundred of TAL Y BONT, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (N. by W.) from Towyn, containing 475 inhabitants. The name is derived from a dangerous ford by which the Dysynni was crossed at this place. This hamlet comprises the western portion of the parish, having the sea on the west, and the river Dysynni on the east and south, so as to form a peninsula. It contains the church, which is seated on the declivity of a lofty mountain near the Dysynni: several respectable residences, some of which command extensive views of the ocean, are scattered over it. A remarkable sand bank, studded with rocks, called Sarn y Bwch, stretches from the shore into the great bay of Cardigan, at the mouth of the river Dysynni.

RHYDGWERN, a hamlet in that part of the parish of MACHEN which is in the hundred of CAERPHILLY, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (E.) from Caerphilly, containing 184 inhabitants. It is bounded on the north and east by the river Romney, which here takes a wide sweep, and is crossed by a bridge on the road from Caerphilly to Newport. The principal part of the parish is in lower Wentloog hundred, county of Monmouth. There are several respectable residences in this hamlet, which is in general well wooded and has a diversified surface. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £36. 9.

RHYDONEN, a joint township with Trevechan, in that part of the parish of LLANYNYS which is in the hundred of RUTHIN, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES. The population is returned with the parish. It is situated near an ancient ford, where there is now a bridge, on the river Clwyd, from which circumstance it takes its name.

RHYD Y BOITHAN (RHYD Y VYDDIN), a hamlet in the parish of EGLWYSILAN, hundred of CAERPHILLY, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (S. E.) from Newbridge, containing 805 inhabitants, the population having increased one-third since the census of 1821. The river Tâf forms the western boundary of this hamlet, which takes its name from a ford that anciently crossed a small stream running into that river, at a place where there is now a bridge. The Glamorganshire canal proceeds along the eastern bank of the river Tâf, and the high road from Cardiff to Merthyr-Tydvil takes its course between them, and within a few yards of each. The hamlet contains numerous respectable and pleasing residences, many of which are ornamented with surrounding plantations. The ruins of Castell Côch, supposed to have been erected by a celebrated chieftain named Ivor Bâch, occupy the brow of a perpendicular rock, near the left bank of the Tâf, at the south-western extremity of the hamlet, and exhibit, in combination with the well-wooded eminences contiguous, a picturesque and diversified scene. Another object of interest here is the tepid spring called Tâf's Well, on the banks of the river.

RHYL, a township in that part of the parish of RHUDDLAN which is in the hundred of PRESTATYN, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (N. N. W.) from the town of Rhuddlan. The population is returned with the parish. This place, which is situated at the northern extremity of the parish, and at the lower end of the fertile Vale of Clwyd, previously to the year 1820, consisted only of a few scattered dwellings; but since that time, from the pleasantness of its situation on the coast of the Irish sea, along the margin of which some fine smooth and firm sands here extend for several miles, it has become a place of favourite resort for sea-bathing, and is frequented by numerous visitors, for whose accommodation two respectable hotels have been established, and several private houses have been erected, in which lodging, with every accommodation, may be obtained. The sands, which project a considerable distance into the sea, besides being very convenient for bathing, afford an extensive and delightful marine promenade. The vicinity commands some fine views of the most picturesque portions of the Vale of Clwyd, the Clwydian range of mountains, Llandulas bay, Orme's Head, the Isle of Anglesey, and the mountains of Cumberland. Steam-vessels land passengers daily at the Vor-ryd pier, about a mile distant; and the various advantages of the place, combined with the retirement of its situation, render it desirable as a place of resort to families wishing to obtain the benefit of sea air and bathing, without the ordinary bustle and fatigue of more fashionable watering-places.

RHYWAEDOG (RHIWAEDOG), a township in the parish of LLANVAWR, hundred of PENLLŶN, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (E. S. E.) from Bala. The population is included in the return for the parish. The name signifies "the bloody brow," and refers to a battle fought here at some remote period, and the peculiar situation of the place on the ridge of a lofty eminence. Pwll y Gelanedd, or "the pool of the slain," is a small lake of stagnant water in a contiguous vale, where a severe contest was maintained between the Britons and the Saxons, in which the only surviving son of the aged Llywarch was slain.

RIDLEY, a township in the parochial chapelry of IS Y COED, hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES,  $5\frac{1}{2}$  miles (E. by N.) from Wrexham, containing 42 inhabitants. It is separately assessed for the maintenance of its poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £39. 13.

ROATH (RH TH), a parish in the hundred of KIBBOR, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (N. E. by E.) from Cardiff, containing 272 inhabitants. Rhâth, the original name of this place, is a common Welsh designation for ancient earthworks, of which there are several in the immediate vicinity: the late Mr. Edward Williams, the Glamorganshire antiquary, supposed this name to be derived from the station Ratostabius, which he places at Cardiff. The parish is situated on the western bank of the river Romney, over which there is a bridge of one arch, and on the great western road through the county. Its surface, forming an extent of about one thousand five hundred acres, is nearly a perfect flat, except that to the north of the village there is a gentle rise. The Romney, which here separates the counties of Glamorgan and Monmouth, formerly inundated the moors to a great extent, but an embankment has been constructed within the last few years, which has confined it to its proper channel. The quality of the soil is various, the upper lands towards the north being a red stiff clay, and the flat ground being composed of sandy loam and gravel, which, towards the moors, become covered with tenacious clay, fit for making bricks. The parish contains several good gentlemen's houses, of which Plas Newydd, in the castellated style, the property of T. M. Richards, Esq., is the principal. It is divided into three lordships, namely, Roath Tewkesbury, Roath Dogfield, and Roath Keynsham: the manorial rights of the two former belong to the Marquis of Bute, and those of the latter to Sir C. Morgan, Bart. The living is a vicarage not in charge, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Marquis of Bute. The church, dedicated to St. Margaret, is a small neat structure: the chancel was rebuilt by the late Marquis of Bute, who also erected, on the northern side of it, a splendid mausoleum for his family, where he and the late Marchioness and Lord Mountstuart are interred. Near the centre of the rising ground to the north of the village is a spring of pure water, called Penylan Well, which has been enclosed, and is greatly resorted to by all classes on Easter Monday, when it is supposed that charms are wrought, fortunes foretold, and wishes registered at the mystic stream. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £233. 13.

ROBESTON WATHEN, or EAST, a parish in the hundred of NARBERTH, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (W. by N.) from Narberth, containing 421 inhabitants. This parish is beautifully situated on the turnpike road leading from Narberth to Haverfordwest, and within a short distance from the Canaston or East Cleddy river, which is navigable to within a few hundred yards of its western boundary. It comprises but a moderate portion of arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and cultivated: the soil is fertile, and the inhabitants are employed in agriculture, and in the procuring of limestone, which is found in some parts of the parish of a very excellent quality, resembling that of Aberthaw in Glamorganshire, and for the exportation of which the river Cleddy affords every facility. The village is seated on an eminence, and with the lofty tower of its church, rising above the thick foliage of the adjacent wood, forms an interesting and highly picturesque object, as seen from a distance. The surrounding scenery is beautifully and richly diversified, and the views over the adjacent country abound with interesting and romantic features. Robeston Wathen House, the seat of the Rev. J. W. James, is a pleasing residence, surrounded with thriving plantations, which, with some neighbouring woods, form one of the few well-timbered spots with which the prevailing nakedness of the county is richly contrasted. From the churchyard is obtained a highly picturesque and beautiful view of the opposite hill, crowned with the magnificent ruins of Lawhaden Castle, apparently on the brink of a richly wooded precipice, overhanging the river Cleddy, which flows at its base, and on the margin of which is seen the church of Lawhaden, in a romantic and sequestered spot. The living is consolidated with the rectory of Narberth, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's. The church, which is situated on elevated ground, is an ancient structure with a lofty square embattled tower. There are some trifling charitable benefactions for the poor, to whom also William Hawkins is said to have bequeathed an annuity of £11. 10., of which no account can at present be obtained. In this parish are the remains of a small encampment, popularly called a Rhâth, but nothing of its origin is known, neither do the remains possess any interest. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £78. 14.

ROBESTON (WEST), a parish in the hundred of RHÔS, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (N. N. W.) from Milford, containing 112 inhabitants. This place is situated a few miles to the north of Milford Haven, and on the old turnpike road leading to Old Milford, or Haking. It comprises but a moderate tract of arable and pasture land, which is all enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. Robeston Hall, a seat belonging to William Henry Scourfield, Esq., of New Mote, is a good family mansion, pleasantly situated, and forming, with its grounds, which are well laid out, an ornamental object. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £88. 8.

ROCH, a parish in the hundred of RHÔS, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (N. W. by W.) from Haverfordwest, containing 791 inhabitants. This place derives its name from a rocky mountainous ridge, rising abruptly from the plain, the summit of which is occupied by an ancient castle, which, from its situation near the extremity of the district of Rhôs, was probably erected as a border fortress by some of the earlier Norman invaders, or by the Flemings, who, in the reign of Henry I., settled in this part of the principality. The first possessor of the castle, of whom any thing is known, was Adam de Rupe, or de la Roche, who is by some writers supposed to have been the founder, and to whom also are attributed the foundation of the church, and of the priory of Hubberston Pill. Little is recorded of the history of the castle, which appears to have been constructed equally with a view to military and domestic purposes: it continued in the family of de la Roche till the reign of Henry VI., when the estates of that family, which were very extensive, were divided between two coheirresses, since which time it is supposed to have been abandoned as a residence. It was garrisoned for the king during the parliamentary war in the reign of Charles I., and in 1644 was besieged by the parliamentarians under the command of Captain Edwards, to whom, after a defence of two days, it was surrendered. The castle, with its demesnes, became the property of John Harries, Esq., from whom it passed by will to the late John Rhys Stokes, and is now the property of John Stokes Stokes, Esq., of Cyfern. The parish, which is situated on the eastern shore of St. Bride's bay, and on the turnpike road leading from Haverfordwest to St. David's, is of considerable extent, comprising a large tract of arable and pasture land, which, with the exception of Cyfern mountain, occupying only a small portion of it, and the cliffs to the west and south-west, bordering upon the bay, is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. Cyfern, the seat of John S. Stokes, Esq., is a handsome residence occupying a pleasant situation.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4. 13. 9., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a plain neat edifice without a tower, consisting only of a nave and chancel: it contains a chaste monument to the memory of the Rev. John Grant, a former vicar of the parish. There were anciently two chapels of ease, both now in ruins: one of these was at Hilton, about a mile to the south of the church, and the other at Trêvran, about a mile and a half distant from it; the latter, situated on the margin of the bay, was called Caradoc's chapel, and was probably erected to commemorate the spot where the corpse of St. Caradoc rested on its way for interment at St. David's. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists. Mr. Henry Grant, third son of the Rev. John Grant, bequeathed £500 for the endowment of a free school here, the interest of which sum is paid towards the support of a school, in which six boys and six girls are gratuitously instructed. Mrs. Fluerton, in 1700, bequeathed a rent-charge of £2 to the poor of this parish. The remains of the castle form an interesting and striking object: this structure originally consisted of one stately tower, divided into three stories, each composed of one large apartment, with an elegant smaller apartment, or retiring-room, having an arched roof and an oriel window, both enriched with tracery: the ruins consist of the shell of this tower, in a very perfect state. The rock on which it is built is, on the south side, incorporated with the building for nearly half the height, and a huge mass protrudes into the lower apartment. The prospect from the tower is very extensive, commanding the whole of St. Bride's bay, with a great part of the adjacent country, which, from the want of wood, with the exception only of two or three small patches, is generally destitute both of pleasing and of picturesque character. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £218.

RUABON (RHIW-ABON), a parish in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (S. W. by S.) from Wrexham, containing 8353 inhabitants. This place, which derives its name from its situation on the small river Avon, is distinguished in the Welsh annals on account of a fierce and obstinately contested battle fought in the vicinity, between the forces under Owain Cyveiliog, Prince of Powys, and the English, in which the former obtained a decisive victory. In commemoration of this event, the Welsh prince, who was eminent both as a warrior and a poet, composed a beautiful poem called Hirlas Owain, or "the Drinking Horn of Owain," of which an elegant translation by the Rev. Richard Williams is preserved in Pennant's Tour in North Wales. The parish is situated in a picturesque part of the county, within three miles of the great Holyhead road, and is bounded on the south by the river Dee. The village, which is of considerable size, and of prepossessing appearance, is situated on the road from Oswestry to Wrexham and Chester, and seems to have been indebted for its original prosperity to the noble mansion of Wynnstay, in the immediate vicinity, and for its present importance chiefly to the extensive mines of iron-stone and coal which abound, particularly in the southern and western parts of the parish. The extensive park of Wynnstay is entered from it by a plain but handsome gateway of modern erection, opening into a straight avenue, nearly a mile in length, composed of lofty trees of ancient growth, in which venerable oaks, stately elms, beeches and chestnuts are intermingled, and at the extremity of which is the mansion, the hospitable residence of Sir Watkin Williams Wynn, Bart., beautifully situated on a fine and extensive lawn, having a noble artificial sheet of water in front, reflecting from its surface the foliage of some majestic trees near its margin. This spacious mansion, which has been erected at different periods, and in various styles of architecture, though wanting unity in its design, is, notwithstanding, a stately pile of building, possessing, from its extent and substantial elevation, a striking character of simple and unostentatious grandeur. The older portion of the building contains the domestic offices and general apartments for the accommodation of the household. On the wall of a tower within the court of this portion of the house are the following Latin verses, allusive to the name of Wynnstay: "Cui domus est victusque decens, et patria dulcis, sunt satis hæc vitæ, cætera cura labor. Struxit Johannes Wynn, Miles et baronetus, A.D. 1706." The more modern part of the building, erected by the first Sir Watkin, and enlarged and modernized by the present baronet, is a handsome substantial structure: the interior comprises several noble apartments, embellished with some excellent family portraits by Sir Joshua Reynolds and some of the best masters, two full-length paintings of Charles II. and his Queen, and several other pictures of merit. Adjoining the house is a small handsome building, originally erected as a theatre, in which, during the festival of Christmas, dramatic performances were exhibited for the amusement of the nobility and gentry of the surrounding country, guests of the hospitable proprietor. The park, which is twelve miles in circumference, is enriched with fine timber, and comprehends much variety and beauty of scenery: there are handsome lodges, or entrances into it from various parts of the surrounding district; and a new drive, leading to the house from the lodge recently built on the London road, has added greatly not only to the convenience of access, but to the embellishment of the grounds on the south side. At a short distance from the hall is the cold bath, near which stands a handsome fluted column, erected after a design by the late Mr. James Wyatt, to the memory of the late Sir Watkin Williams Wynn, Bart., by his mother: the shaft of the column, which is one hundred feet high, rests upon a square pedestal, sixteen feet high, ornamented on the faces with festooned wreaths of oak leaves, and at the angles with eagles finely moulded in bronze; the capital is surmounted by an entablature supporting a circular platform surrounded with an iron balustrade, to which there is an ascent from within the column by a flight of spiral steps, and having in the centre a circular pedestal, twelve feet high, on which is placed a massive vase of bronze, enriched with goats' heads. Over the door leading to the ascent there is a tablet bearing the following inscription: "To the memory of Sir Watkin Williams Wynn, Bart., who died the 29th day of July, MDCCLXXXIX., this column was erected by his affectionate mother, Frances Williams Wynn;" and on the north-east side, in letters of copper, is the inscription "Filio optimo, Mater Eheu Superstes." Near this column is a fine sheet of water, bounded by Wat's Dyke, which here intersects the park, and from which the mansion originally derived the name of Wattstay, changed by Sir John Wynn to its present appellation. The dyke, which entered the park near its northern boundary, has been levelled in its course through the grounds, but is traced again on the south side, near Penylan, and crosses the river Dee at its junction with the Ceiriog. By the late improvements, part of Offa's Dyke is now within the limits of the park, which it enters at the second lodge from Ruabon, and leaves again near the Waterloo Tower. Near the south-western extremity of the woods there is a cenotaph, erected by Sir W. Williams Wynn, Bart., from a design by Sir Jeffrey Wyatville, to the memory of his brother officers and soldiers who were slain during the rebellion in Ireland, in 1798: it stands on an eminence overlooking a deep ravine, called Nant y Bele, "the dingle of the marten," through which the river Dee urges its rapid course along a narrow channel, richly fringed with impending woods: from this building there is a most extensive and magnificent prospect, embracing a vast extent of the counties of Carnarvon, Denbigh, Flint, Chester, and Salop, Chirk Castle and its noble park, and the whole of the beautiful vale of Llangollen, including the stupendous aqueduct of Pont y Cyssylltau, and the majestic and elevated ruins of Castell Dinas Brân, with the fine range of mountains in the distance.

This parish comprises an important part of the Denbighshire coal tract, of which the principal seam of coal is here nine feet thick. Its mineral wealth in coal and iron-ore, particularly in the southern and western parts of it, has caused the establishment of numerous works, which till the year 1830 were in full operation, and extensive mines have been opened; so that a great part of the parish is now occupied by pits, charcoal hearths, and mineral works of various kinds, and is intersected in different directions by rail-roads. At Acrevair, within its limits, there are a very extensive iron-foundry and colliery, belonging to the British Iron Company, in which three hundred men were constantly employed. There are also numerous blast furnaces and forges in other parts of the parish, for the manufacture of iron; and at the Cevn, a large straggling village on the northern bank of the Dee, near a bridge over that river, called New-bridge, is a large establishment, in which are mills for rolling hoop and sheet iron: there are also considerable coal-works and a manufactory for coarse earthenware in this part of the parish. The Ellesmere canal, after passing over the Pont y Cyssylltau aqueduct, terminates in this parish: there is also a branch canal from the aqueduct, on the north bank of the river Dee, which passes by Trevor and Llangollen, and terminates at Llantysillio, where it receives from the Dee a supply of water for the whole line of the canal. It is in contemplation to construct a rail-road, to proceed directly from the Ellesmere canal to Chester, and to be continued thence to Liverpool: a railway, three miles and a quarter in length, already extends from the aqueduct through an extensive coal-field to Ruabon brook. Fairs are held annually on the last Friday in February, May 22nd, and November 20th; and a post-office has been established in the village.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £13. 6. 0½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The vicarage is endowed with a portion of the great tithes, consisting of one-fourth part of the tithe of corn throughout the whole parish, and the whole of the tithe of hay in several of the hamlets within its limits. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a spacious and venerable structure, containing some splendid monuments to the family of Wynn: the most ancient is one to the memory of Johannes ab Ellis Eyton, who joined the party of the Earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII., and, in reward for his eminent services, received from that monarch an extensive grant of lands in this part of the principality. In the same sepulchral chapel, on the south side of the chancel, are the monuments of Henry Wynn, Esq., tenth son of Sir John Wynn of Gwydir, ancestor of the present family: on this monument he is represented in a standing posture, and on one side is a kneeling figure of Sir John Wynn, and on the other of his wife Jane, daughter of Eyton Evans, by whom the Wynnstay estate was obtained. On the opposite side of the altar there is a beautiful monument, by Rysbrach, to the first Sir Watkin Williams Wynn, who was killed by a fall from his horse, in 1749: his effigy, in a graceful attitude, is finely sculptured, and his various virtues are recorded in an elegant Latin eulogium, written by Dr. King, of St. Mary's Hall, Oxford. There is also a fine monument, by Nollekins, to Lady Henrietta, first wife of the second Sir Watkin, who died only a few weeks after her marriage, in 1769: on the pedestal is an exquisitely sculptured figure of Hope, reclining on an urn, and on one side is an inscription enclosed within a serpent having the tail in its mouth, emblematical of eternity. The church was thoroughly repaired in 1772, at the expense of the late Sir Watkin, who presented an organ, and also, on the baptism of his eldest son, the present baronet, an elegant font of white marble, supported by a tripod of beautiful design. There are places of worship for General and Particular Baptists, Independents, and Primitive and Wesleyan Methodists.

The Rev. John Robinson, vicar of this parish, in 1703, bequeathed the whole of his estate, in the hamlet of Moreton, to his successors in the vicarage, in trust to receive out of the rents £12 per annum for preaching a sermon every Sunday afternoon in the parish church, and to appropriate the remainder to the support of a free school, to be open to all children of the parish, and under the care of a master appointed by the vicar: he also gave lands in the parish of Wrexham to the vicars, in trust, to pay sixpence per week to nine poor people of this parish, and one of the parish of Erbistock, with a gown or coat to each every Christmas, and also to clothe six poor children from six to twelve years of age; and by a codicil to his will he gave a house and garden, and £50 in money, towards the erection of almshouses for ten poor people, which he directed to be built near the church. The endowment of the school was augmented by Ellis Lloyd, in 1711, who bequeathed £200 for the support of the master, and for apprenticing poor boys: the school-room, which adjoins the churchyard, is open to all children of the parish for gratuitous instruction. The Rev. Richard Davies, vicar of the parish, in 1740, bequeathed an estate in the Vale of Clwyd for the erection and endowment of eight almshouses for so many poor men and women: the almshouses are now eighteen in number, and the inmates receive a weekly allowance of three shillings each. There are also four almshouses at Nant y Gwallia, in this parish, erected in 1782, by Mrs. Rowland, of Plâs Binnion, who vested the nomination of the almspeople in her heirs. Numerous other charitable donations and bequests have been at various times and by different benefactors made to the poor of the parish, amounting to more than £2000, of which a part has been vested in the purchase of estates, and the whole produces a very considerable annual income, which is regularly distributed among the poor. Offa's Dyke and Wat's Dyke both intersect the parish, and in their courses approach within a quarter of a mile of each other, near the village, but diverge as they are traced either northward or southward, so as shortly to leave an interval of several miles. Various vegetable impressions, and a great variety of petrefactions are found in the mines, and also near the river Dee, in the southern portion of the parish. The Rev. Peter Roberts, A.M., M.P.S., the learned editor of the Collectanea Cambrica, and author of the "Early History of the Cymry, or Ancient Britons," and other works, resided in this parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £1374. 1.

RUDBAXTON, a parish in the hundred of DUNGLEDY, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (N.) from Haverfordwest, containing 621 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the turnpike road leading from Haverfordwest to Fishguard, is intersected by a stream which flows into the Western Cleddy, and is wholly enclosed and under cultivation. Its surface is enlivened by two gentlemen's seats of cheerful aspect, viz., Wythy Bush, the seat of the Rev. Thomas Martin, a good family mansion pleasantly situated; and Poyston, also the property of that gentleman. The petty sessions for the hundred were formerly held at this place, prior to their removal to Haverfordwest. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £15. 4. 2., and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is not remarkable for any striking architectural details: opposite to the entrance of the churchyard is one of those large mounds so frequently found in this part of the principality, but of which the use has not been clearly ascertained. There were formerly two chapels of ease, one dedicated to St. Margaret, and the other to St. Catherine, but both are now in ruins. There is a place of worship for Baptists. Thomas Howard, by deed, gave a rent-charge of £2, which is annually paid by the corporation of Haverfordwest to poor housekeepers of this parish not receiving parochial relief. About three miles to the north-east of Haverfordwest, within the limits of this parish, there is a hill on which is an encampment, called by the country people "the Rhâth." Lieutenant-General Sir Thomas Picton, G.C.B., who fell in the battle of Waterloo, was born at Poyston. The poor are maintained by an average annual expenditure amounting to £245. 13.

RUDDRY (YR-YW-DRE), a parish in the hundred of CAERPHILLY, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (N. by E.) from Cardiff, containing 276 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the number of yew trees in the vicinity of the village, is pleasantly situated in a mountain valley in the eastern part of the county, and comprises but a small tract of land, of which a considerable portion is unenclosed and uncultivated. The inhabitants are chiefly engaged in agricultural pursuits. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied, and enlivened by the river Romney, which forms the eastern boundary of the parish; and from the higher grounds are some richly diversified views over the adjacent country, embracing a portion of the picturesque county of Monmouth. Lead-ore has been found in the white limestone of the parish. The living is consolidated with the rectory of Bedwas, in Monmouthshire, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf. The church, dedicated to St. James, is not remarkable for any architectural details. C. Edward Edmond, in 1743, bequeathed £2 per annum to the poor of this parish, which is regularly paid. Here is a mineral spring, which is said to be highly efficacious in curing diseases of the eye, and is much resorted to for that purpose. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £140. 4.

RÛG, a chapelry, partly in the parish of CORWEN, and partly in that of GWYDDELWERN, in the hundred of EDEYRNION, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 1½ mile (W. by N.) from Corwen. The population is returned with Corwen. This place, which is situated on the turnpike road from Corwen to Ruthin, and between the beautiful vales of Edeyrnion and Glyn-dyrdwy, anciently formed a lordship, and is memorable for the treachery practised on Gruffydd ab Cynan, King of North Wales, who, after his victory at Carno, in the year 1077, was inveigled to this place by the artifices of Meirion Gôch, by whom he was betrayed into the power of Hugh Lupus, Earl of Chester, and Hugh Belesme, Earl of Shrewsbury. From this place Gruffydd was conveyed to the castle of Chester, in which he remained a prisoner for twelve years, but was at length released from confinement by the enterprising bravery of a young man of this neighbourhood, named Cynric Hir, who, going to Chester under pretence of purchasing goods, contrived, while the keepers were feasting, to carry away his prince, loaded with chains, upon his back, and convey him to a place of safety. The lordship afterwards came into the possession of Owain Brogyntyn, natural son of Madoc ab Meredydd, Prince of Powys, whose great merit procured for him an equal share in the inheritance of that prince with his legitimate brothers: it subsequently passed by marriage with the heiress of Ievan Hywel, one of his descendants, to Pyers Salusbury, of Bâchymbyd. After the attainder of Owain Glyndwr, in the reign of Henry IV., the lordship of Glyn-dyrdwy, or Glyn-dwrdwy, was purchased from that monarch by Robert, a descendant of this family, which existed in the male line till the last century. The house and demesnes are now the property of G. H. Vaughan, Esq., who, in 1807, succeeded his brother, Lieut.-Col. E. W. Vaughan, who had assumed the name of Salusbury, a distinguished officer in the Guards, who died in Sicily, and to whose memory a handsome monument was erected at Syracuse, by his brother officers. The ancient mansion was taken down and rebuilt by that gentleman, only a short time before his decease. The present house, which is a handsome structure, is pleasantly situated; and in the grounds there is an artificial mound, which was probably once the site of a small fortress. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Corwen, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph. The chapel, founded by Colonel William Salusbury, who was governor of Denbigh Castle during the parliamentary war, is a neat edifice, appropriately fitted up for the performance of divine service.

RULEN (RHULEN), a parochial chapelry in the hundred of COLWYN, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (E. by S.) from Builth, containing 119 inhabitants. Its surface is hilly, and its soil for the most part barren, the whole consisting of about five hundred acres of enclosed, and three hundred of unenclosed, land: it is skirted on the west by the river Edwy.

In civil matters it forms an independent parish, but is ecclesiastically regarded as a chapelry consolidated with the vicarage of Glâscomb, within the limits of which parish it was formerly included, the inhabitants having certain seats appropriated to their use in the mother church, to the repairs of which they still contribute. In the king's books it is described as a chapel to Glâscomb, of the certified value of £4. 13. 4. The chapel, dedicated to St. David, is a small plain structure, situated about three-quarters of a mile from the river Edwy. Ten shillings per annum have been left to the poor by some unknown benefactor. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £116. 5.

RUTHIN (RHUDD-DIN or RHUTHYN), a borough, market, and assize town, and a parish, in the hundred of RUTHIN, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (S. E. by S.) from Denbigh, and 210 (N. W. by W.) from London, containing 3376 inhabitants. The Welsh name of this place, "Castell Côch yn Gwernvor," has induced historians to conclude that there was an ancient British fortress here, prior to the time of Edward I., who is said to have been the founder of the present castle, which, from the colour of the stone procured for that purpose, obtained the appellation of Rhudd-ddin, or "the red or brown fortress," from which the town also derived its present name, or rather from the stratum of red freestone pervading the parish. Edward granted this place, together with the cantrev of Dyfryn Clwyd, and some other lands now constituting the present lordship of Ruthin, to Reginald, second son of John de Grey, by whom some historians, and among them Camden, assert that the castle and the town were both originally founded, by permission of that monarch. The castle and lordship of Ruthin remained for several generations in the undisturbed possession of the family of De Grey; and the town, which, under their protection, continued to advance in prosperity, became at an early period a considerable place, and had one of the best markets in the Vale of Clwyd. Little, however, is recorded of the history of the castle, which appears to have been wholly unconnected with any of the political transactions of the conquest of Wales. Reginald de Grey was summoned to parliament in the 14th of Edward I., by the title of Lord Grey of Ruthin. In 1400, Owain Glyndwr, who, in resistance to the government of Henry IV., spread devastation through almost every part of the principality which acknowledged the authority of that monarch, made a sudden attack upon this place during the fair which was held here, and, after some fruitless attempts to take the castle, plundered the inhabitants, burnt the town, and retreated in safety to the mountains. The castle and the lordship continued in the possession of the lords de Grey, whom Edward IV. elevated to the earldom of Kent, till the reign of Henry VII., when they were sold by Richard Earl of Kent to that monarch, and became an appendage of the crown.

Henry VIII. granted the castle and its dependencies to his son Henry Fitzroy, Duke of Richmond, at whose death they again reverted to the crown, and were bestowed by Elizabeth on Ambrose Dudley, Earl of Warwick. After the death of the Earl of Warwick, these possessions, again reverting to the crown, were granted on lease by James I. to Sir Francis Crane, to whom they were afterwards sold in the reign of Charles I. During the parliamentary war in the reign of this monarch, the castle was garrisoned for the king, and in 1644 was besieged by Sir Thomas Myddelton and Colonel Mytton, but resolutely held out against the besiegers, who found themselves unable to reduce it. In the following year the king visited this place in person, attended by Prince Maurice, and, after remaining only for a short time, and inspecting the garrison, continued his route through North Wales to Chester. The castle was again besieged in February 1646, by Major-General Mytton, and a strong party of the parliamentary forces, to whom, after an obstinate defence, the garrison surrendered on honourable terms, in the month of April following, and the fortifications were soon afterwards demolished by order of the parliament. After the Restoration, the castle and its dependencies were purchased by Sir Richard Myddelton; and on the site of the former an elegant castellated mansion has lately been erected by the Hon. Frederick West; but the lordship and its other dependencies are the property of Sir Richard's descendant, Miss Myddelton.

The town is beautifully situated on the summit and acclivity of an eminence in the picturesque Vale of Clwyd, at the base of which, and partly through the town, flows the river from which the vale takes its name, at this place an inconsiderable stream, serving only to work some mills in the neighbourhood. The appearance of the town, which is well built, is pleasing; and the neighbourhood is embellished with numerous gentlemen's seats, and comprehends some pleasingly varied scenery. No particular trade or manufacture is carried on here, except what is necessary for the accommodation of the inhabitants, who are principally engaged in agriculture. It has been for some time in contemplation to make the river Clwyd navigable from this place to Rhuddlan, sixteen miles distant, a project which might be carried into effect at a comparatively inconsiderable expense, and would conduce materially to promote the prosperity of the town and neighbourhood. The market, which is abundantly supplied with corn, is on Monday, and a second market is also held on Saturday for provisions. Fairs are held annually on the first Monday after the 12th of January, March 19th and 20th, the Friday before Whit-Sunday, August 8th, September 30th, and November 10th. During the hay and corn harvests, the farmers of the Vale of Clwyd attend every morning at the market-place to hire labourers for the day, who assemble here for that purpose, with their scythes and reaping-hooks.

The government of the borough is vested by charter of incorporation, granted by Henry VII., in two aldermen, sixteen common-councilmen, and an indefinite number of burgesses: the aldermen are appointed annually at the court held for the lordship, at Michaelmas; and they, immediately on assuming office, appoint the common-councilmen. This place is one of the contributory boroughs which, with Denbigh, return one member to parliament: the right of voting is vested in the resident burgesses, if duly qualified according to the provisions of the late act, in number at present three hundred and twenty-five, and in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act demands: the present number of tenements of this value, within the limits of the borough, is about one hundred and fifty, but they are not all now rated as of the requisite value. The exact limits of the borough are not clearly defined in the charter, but by prescription are held to comprise the whole of the parish of Ruthin, part of that of Llanvwrog, the hamlet of Llanrhudd Isav, in the parish of Llanrhudd, and part of the parishes of Llanynys and Llanvair-Dyfryn-Clwyd. The burgesses are elected by the aldermen and a majority of the common-councilmen. Formerly, the eldest sons of freemen, and apprentices who had served their time to a freeman, might demand the freedom of the borough, but no claim for admission, in those respects, has been made for many years. Ruthin has been made a polling-place in the election of knights for the shire; and, from its central situation, it has been selected, in preference to the town of Denbigh, for holding the assizes for the county; and the quarter-sessions are held alternately here and at Denbigh. A court leet for the lordship is held twice a year, namely, within one month after Easter and Michaelmas; and a court baron is held every alternate Saturday, at which the steward presides: the latter is also a court of record, taking cognizance of complaints and civil actions arising within the limits of the lordship; and the offices of steward and recorder of this court were formerly (when the lordship belonged to the Crown) patent offices. The town-hall, situated near the market-place, is a substantial building, but in no respect remarkable for its style of architecture. Prior to the erection of the county hall, in this town, it was used for holding occasionally the great and quarter sessions, but now solely for the meetings of the corporation, which take place in the long room, and the lordship's courts. This building has very recently been most handsomely repaired, at the expense of the lady of the manor. The county hall, in which the great sessions are held, and the quarter sessions alternately with Denbigh, is a beautiful modern structure, and, with the county gaol and house of correction, also situated here, is highly creditable to the talents of the architect, Mr. Turner. The gaol has recently been enlarged by the addition of a building for female prisoners, and comprises six distinct wards for male, and four wards for female prisoners, for whose classification it is thus well adapted: the male prisoners are employed on the tread-wheel, or in knitting worsted gloves, and the females in washing for themselves and the other prisoners: the former are allowed the whole of their earnings in knitting, and the females receive one shilling per week for washing, and fourpence in every shilling which they earn by sewing. There are two infirmaries in the prison; divine service is performed twice, and a sermon delivered once on every Sunday by the chaplain, and prayers are read daily by the gaoler to the prisoners, who are supplied gratuitously with bibles and religious tracts.

The living is a rectory consolidated with that of Llanrhudd, and forming jointly with it the endowment of Christ's Hospital in Ruthin, the warden of which establishment is the principal minister of both churches, appointing a curate to each, who is responsible to him for its spiritual care; and the prescribed duties of his office likewise require him occasionally to share in their holy labours: the patronage of the wardenship is in the Dean and Chapter of Westminster. This place, which is in the diocese of Bangor, forms the head of the rural deanery of Dyfryn Clwyd, and is not within the jurisdiction of any archdeaconry. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, was made collegiate and parochial about the year 1310, by John, son of Reginald de Grey, who endowed it for a prior, or warden, and a few regular priests, to perform mass at the mother church of Llanrhudd, the chapel at the castle, and this collegiate and parochial church; and it is still not unfrequently called "the Collegiate and Parochial church of St. Peter," retaining its name prior to its being re-founded by Dean Goodman. It is an ancient edifice in various styles of architecture, and appears to have been built at different periods, or to have undergone material alterations: the tower, and the south and west fronts, which are of the most modern date, are greatly inferior to the rest of the building: the interior is of better character, and the roof, which is of carved oak, panelled, richly sculptured, and apparently of the time of Henry VII., is supposed to have been constructed by that monarch after his purchase of the lordship from the Earl of Kent: on the panels are the inscriptions, in relief, "Jesus Mercy," "Lady help," and "Mater Maria, ora pro nobis." One hundred and forty-four sittings have recently been added, towards defraying the expense of which the Incorporated Society for the erection and enlargement of churches and chapels granted the sum of £50, in consideration of which ninety sittings have been declared free and unappropriated. A vestry-room, with a library, has been added at the west end, at the expense of the present warden.

The free grammar school was founded in 1595, by Dr. Goodman, Dean of Westminster, who endowed it with one-half of the tithes of the parish of Llanelidan, for the support of a master and usher, for the gratuitous instruction of boys born in the town of Ruthin and parish of Llanelidan, the master to be appointed by the Bishop of Bangor, and the warden of Christ's hospital, in this town, and the usher to be appointed by the master: the master's house, school-room, dormitory and library above, were repaired and improved in 1831, by means of donations from the bishop, the warden, and the master, and other liberal contributions, which are recorded on a card in the school-room. This school has two exhibitions to either of the Universities, founded by Godfrey Goodman, Bishop of Gloucester, and nephew to the founder, and under the regulation of a decree of the court of Chancery, in 1824, which are in the gift of the warden of Christ's hospital, and other trustees; and also others founded by the Rev. Edward Lloyd, rector of the parish of Ripple, the number of which varies in proportion to the fluctuating income of the estate, situated in the county of Flint, which was purchased with his pecuniary bequest. The school has likewise a claim, in conjunction with that of Bangor, to a fellowship founded in St. John's College, Cambridge, by Dr.

John Gwyn, in the 13th of the reign of Elizabeth. Among the eminent men who have received the rudiments of their education in the free grammar school of Ruthin, may be noticed, Dr. John Davies, author of a Welsh grammar and dictionary; Dr. John Williams, Lord Keeper and Archbishop of York; Dr. John Wynne, Principal of Jesus' College, Oxford, and successively Bishop of St. Asaph, and of Bath and Wells; Dr. Tucker, Dean of Gloucester; the Right Hon. Lloyd Lord Kenyon; the Hon. Mr. Baron Perryn; Lord Chief Baron Richards; Dr. H. Owen, Rector of St. Olave, Hart-street, London; Dr. Edwards, Archdeacon of Brecknock; Dr. Cotton, Dean of Chester, and various others. The present warden is the Rev. R. Newcome, author of Memoirs of Dr. Goodman, Dean of Westminster, the founder, and Dr. Godfrey Goodman, Bishop of Gloucester, and author also of the histories of the castles and towns of Denbigh and Ruthin. A National school, erected by subscription among the principal inhabitants of the town of Ruthin, and the parishes of Llanrhudd and Llanvwrog, in which seventy boys and sixty girls of those places are gratuitously instructed, is also supported by subscription.

Christ's Hospital, in Ruthin, was founded by Dr. Gabriel Goodman, Dean of Westminster, under letters patent of the 32d of Elizabeth, for a priest and twelve poor persons, ten men, and two women to attend them, all unmarried and above fifty years of age. Dr. Goodman, prior to this time, had erected twelve almshouses for so many poor persons, and, by letters patent of the above date, he incorporated the society under the designation of the "President and Warden of Christ's Hospital in Ruthin," and endowed the same with the tithes of Ruthin and Llanrhudd; appointing the Bishop of Bangor for the time being president, and the priest, warden: these two have the entire government of the hospital, and also of the grammar school founded by the same benefactor. The houses, which are in good repair, are pleasantly situated on the east side of the churchyard, and the almspeople receive each three shillings every week, and £1 quarterly, with gowns and shoes every year. Dr. Godfrey Goodman, Bishop of Gloucester, in 1655, bequeathed lands in Yale and in the county of Carnarvon, the produce of the former, now £50 per annum, to be distributed weekly in bread to the poor of Ruthin, and the rents of those in Carnarvon to be appropriated in apprenticing two boys, and to the support of a traveller beyond the seas; the latter bequest was, by a decree of the court of Chancery, in 1824, converted into the two above-mentioned exhibitions for the free grammar school. There are also several other charitable donations and bequests, the produce of which is annually distributed among the poor.

The ancient castle occupied the declivity of a hill fronting the Vale of Clwyd towards the west, and, from the extensive foundations and remaining portions of the walls, appears to have been a structure of great strength and magnificence: the remains consist chiefly of a few fragments of the towers, and of ruined walls, nearly levelled with the foundation; and within the area of this once splendid pile are, a meadow, a fives'

court, and a bowling-green. From various parts of the site are some rich and extensive prospects, embracing many interesting objects. Near the town-hall is a rude block of limestone, called Maen Huail, on which it is said the celebrated Prince Arthur beheaded his rival Huail, brother to Gildas, the historian. Ruthin mill, a curious ancient edifice, having on the apex of the eastern gable a red stone cross, is supposed to have been originally the chapel of the cell of White friars, mentioned by Leland as formerly existing here, but of which no records are preserved. Notice is also taken of a cell of Bonhommes, at this place, probably the original establishment for which John de Grey, with the consent of the bishop of Bangor and the rector of Llanrhudd, made the church collegiate: the apartments of the canons were connected with the church by a cloister, a remaining portion of which has been converted into a house for the warden of Christ's hospital: the parlours and hall are much admired for their beautifully groined roofs. The elegant castellated mansion erected by the Hon. F. West, on the site of the ancient castle, forms an interesting and beautiful feature in the prospect of the town. Dr. Gabriel Goodman, Dean of Westminster, one of the translators of Archbishop Parker's bible, and principal promoter of Bishop Morgan's Welsh translation; Edward Thelwall, tutor to Lord Herbert, of Chirbury; Dr. Parry, Bishop of St. Asaph; Dr. Goodman, Bishop of Gloucester; Sir Eubule Thelwall, Knt., principal, and second founder, of Jesus' College, Oxford; and Sir Thomas Exmewe, lord mayor of London in 1517, were all natives of this place. The barony of Grey de Ruthin is at present enjoyed by Barbara, daughter of Henry Edward Gould, Esq., who, as nineteenth baron, assumed the name and arms of Yelverton, and whose decease occurred in 1810. The poor are maintained by an average annual expenditure amounting to £659. 16.

RYTON, a township in that part of the parish of BANGOR which is in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (S. E. by S.) from Wrexham, containing 113 inhabitants. It is situated on the north-western side of the river Dee, and the population is exclusively agricultural. There is a separate assessment for the support of the poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £69. 14.

S.

SALFORD, a joint township with Kennarton, in the parish of OLD RADNOR, within the liberties of the borough of NEW RADNOR, county of RADNOR, NORTH WALES. The population is returned with Kennarton.

SALTNEY, a township in the parish of HAWARDEN, hundred of MOLD, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 1½ mile (W.) from Chester, containing 172 inhabitants. This township, formerly a marshy waste, borders on the upper part of the æstuary of the Dee, on the confines of Cheshire. It is bounded on the north by the new channel formed for that river, over which at this place are two ferries, supported at the expense of the River Dee Company. The monks of Basingwerk formerly possessed this marsh for pasturage, it having been granted by Robert Lord of Mold, who bestowed on them the like privilege in Hawarden, and also that of cutting rushes to thatch their buildings. This tract extended into Cheshire, and a stone near the east end marked the boundary in that county. It was here that Henry II. encamped with his army, in 1157, when he sent forward the division which was defeated in the woods of Euloe Castle by the sons of Owain Gwynedd, who pursued the fugitives to Henry's camp. Upwards of two thousand acres, forming the greater part of the township, was enclosed pursuant to an act obtained in 1778, and is now well cultivated. A manufactory for glauber salts, sal ammoniac, ivory black, &c., has been established here since 1781. Morva - Caer-Lleon, or "the Marsh of Caer Lleon," now Chester, was the ancient name of this place. The poor are maintained by a separate assessment, the average annual expenditure amounting to £63. 19.

SCYBOR Y COED (YSGUBOR Y COED), a hamlet in the parish of LLANVIHANGEL - GENEU 'R GLYN, hundred of GENEU 'R GLYN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 12 miles (N. E. by E.) from Aberystwith, containing 701 inhabitants. It is situated on the road from Aberystwith to Machynlleth, and on the eastern bank of the small river Einon, near its junction with the Dyvi or Dovey. The immediate neighbourhood is well wooded and agreeable, and some respectable residences are scattered over the hamlet, various parts of which command fine views of the estuary of the Dovey. The principal mansion is Glandyvi, the residence of George Jeffreys, Esq., which commands a fine view of the Vale of Dovey and of St. George's channel. In this hamlet were conveniently situated the smelting-houses and refining-mills, commonly called the "Silver Mills," belonging to the company that formerly worked the royal mines in Cardiganshire. In consequence of its contiguity to the river Dovey, which is navigable to Garreg for vessels of three hundred tons' burden, and by means of which it carries on a considerable trade in the exportation of lead-ore and bark, and the importation of timber, coal, and limestone, this place promises to increase in importance, though the population has somewhat declined since the census of 1821. It contains the chapel of Eglwys-Vâch, or Llanvihangel-Capel-Edwin, the living of which is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Mrs. Jane Davies. The chapel, dedicated to St. Michael, was erected early in the seventeenth century, and is now about to be taken down and rebuilt by subscription. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £314. 19.

SEALAND, a township in the parish of HAWARDEN, hundred of MOLD, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. by E.) from Hawarden, containing 290 inhabitants. It formerly constituted part of the extensive maritime waste called Saltney Marsh, which composed the upper part of the estuary of the river Dee, and extended between the counties of Flint and Chester; but in 1732, Nathaniel Kenderley and Co., subsequently constituted "the River Dee Company," obtained an act of parliament for cutting a canal from Chester through this marsh, thereby forming a new channel for that river, which object they accomplished in 1737, and thus upwards of eight hundred acres were separated from the southern portion, and constituted a new township, under the name of "Sealand." At different subsequent periods three thousand acres have been enclosed and added by the same Company, and there still remains a considerable portion of marsh land exposed to inundation at high water. For the first part enclosed the Company were bound to pay £200 per annum to the lord of the manor of Hawarden and other trustees, who, or any five of them, were to apply that sum to such purposes as they might think necessary; the same Company also charged themselves with maintaining at all times two ferries across the new channel. The greater portion of the enclosed marsh is now fertile arable land.

SEGROIT, a joint township with Cader, in the parish of LLANRHAIDR IN KINMERCH, hundred of ISALED, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (S.) from Denbigh. The population is included in the return for the parish. A stream which falls into the river Clwyd bounds it on the north. It was formerly assessed with the townships of Cader and Segroit Uchâv for the joint maintenance of their poor, but now there is a general assessment for the parish.

SENNI (SENNY), a hamlet in the parish and hundred of DEVYNOC, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (W. S. W.) from Brecknock, containing 303 inhabitants. It comprises the upper part of the vale through which the river Senni flows, and anciently formed a part of the Great Forest of Devynock, which contained twenty thousand acres, extending over the surrounding district. On the river Senni, which is crossed by several bridges, is one of the "Lord's Mills," to which the resident tenants of this hamlet are obliged to send their corn to be ground, an exaction of servitude formerly extorted by the lords of Brecknock, and still claimed by the lords of the manor of the Great Forest, but not rigidly enforced at present. The tenants, however, possess the privilege of grazing their cattle within that district, on the payment of a small regulated sum for each beast, which is called Cymmorth. On the attainder of Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, who was lord of Brecknock, this demand of cymmorth reverted to the crown, and these dues were assigned on lease, in the 10th of George I., to the ancestor of the present possessor. About fifty years ago the tenants disputed the claim, but it was established by a legal decision. The hamlet is highly cultivated, and presents many pleasing prospects. The parochial church, though situated at the lower end of the Vale of Senni, is included within the adjacent hamlet of Maescar: that of Senni, however, contains a place of worship for Independents. There are three almshouses, endowed by the bequest of David Walter, in 1723, who also left a small sum for the apprenticing of poor children. This hamlet is separately assessed for the maintenance of its poor, the average annual expenditure for which purpose is £175. 14.

SESSWICK, a township in that part of the parish of BANGOR which is in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (S. E.) from Wrexham, containing 150 inhabitants. This hamlet is situated on the western side of the river Dee. It maintains its own poor by a separate assessment, the average annual expenditure amounting to £55. 8.

SILIAN (SULIEN), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of MOYTHEN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (N. by W.) from Lampeter, containing 327 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated in the south-eastern portion of the county, derives its name from the saint to whom its church is dedicated, who flourished during the earlier part of the sixth century. It comprises but a moderate extent of arable and pasture land, which is partly enclosed: the surface is varied, and the soil is in some parts tolerably fertile. The village is in some degree enlivened by its situation on the great turnpike roads leading from Aberystwith, in this county, and from Rhaiadr, in the county of Radnor, to Lampeter. The living is consolidated with the vicarage of Llanwnnen, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Sulien, and very romantically situated, is an ancient edifice, not distinguished by any architectural details of importance: it consists of a nave and chancel, and the font, which is circular, and of antique design, is ornamented with four human faces. In the churchyard there is a rudely sculptured monument of stone, now scarcely a foot above the surface of the ground, ornamented on one side with Runic knots, and on the other with zig-zag lines. A Sunday school, which is gratuitously superintended by some of the parishioners, is supported by subscription. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £89. 12.

SKEIR, an extra-parochial district, in the hundred of NEWCASTLE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (W.) from Bridgend. It consists of only one large farm of several hundred acres, situated adjacent to Skeir Point, on the shore of the Bristol channel, and close to Kenwig common: it formerly belonged to the abbey of Neath, which accounts for its being unattached to any parish.

SKOKHAM ISLE, an extra-parochial district, in the hundred of RHÔS, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (W.) from Dale. It comprises about two hundred acres, and is situated about three miles from the main land, and five miles west by north from St. Anne's Point, at the mouth of Milford Haven. The shore on all sides is bold and in some places precipitous, except for a small space on the north side, where is the landing-place. The southern portion is based on red rab-stone, and the northern on limestone: it is chiefly valuable for the pasturage of sheep, and as a rabbit warren: a small turbary supplies fuel, and there is an abundance of fresh water. The channel between this island and that of Gresholm, extending in a line towards St. Anne's lighthouse, is called the Wild Goose Race.

SKOMAR, a small island forming a detached portion of the parish of ST. MARTIN, HAVERFORDWEST, situated off St. Bride's Point, from which it is separated by a strait called Jack Sound. It lies nearly due north of the islet of Skokham, from which it is separated by a strait, a mile and a half in breadth, called Broad Sound; and comprises about seven hundred acres, of which a considerable portion is under tillage. It abounds with rabbits, has an abundance of fresh water, and is based on limestone, of which there are various detached rocks on its shores, the principal of which is Midland Isle, lying in Jack Sound: the whole is let to a resident tenant.

SLEBECH, a parish in the hundred of DUNGLEDY, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles (E.) from Haverfordwest, containing 353 inhabitants. This parish, which is delightfully situated on the banks of the Eastern Cleddy, and on the turnpike road from Haverfordwest to Narberth, comprises a large extent of arable and pasture land, which is all enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The surface is pleasingly varied, and the soil generally fertile and productive: the rates are collected by the ploughland. The aspect is pleasing, and in some parts enlivened with gentlemen's seats, the grounds attached to which form a fine contrast to the want of variety and embellishment observed in other parts of the county. Slebech Hall, the property of the Baron de Rutzen, by marriage with the heiress of the late Nathaniel Philipps, Esq., is an elegant, substantial, and comparatively modern mansion, forming a quadrangle of noble elevation, with every appendage of luxury, and surrounded by beautiful pleasure grounds: it was erected by the late John Symmons, Esq., on the site of an ancient commandery of the knights of St. John of Jerusalem, which, at the dissolution, was purchased by Roger and Thomas Barlow, the last representative of which family conveyed it by marriage to the late Mr. Symmons, from whom it was purchased by the late Nathaniel Philipps, Esq., whose daughter is the present Baroness de Rutzen. Picton Castle, the seat of Sir Richard B. P. Philipps, Bart., partly in this parish and partly in that of Boulston, is a noble and spacious mansion of considerable antiquity; and though it has undergone some alterations and received several additions, to adapt it more for the purpose of modern residence, it still preserves much of its original character of a fortress. It was erected by William de Picton, one of the followers of Arnulph de Montgomery, and has been inhabited without intermission since that remote period. The greater portion of the building, to which the late Lord Milford made some splendid additions, is in the ancient style of baronial grandeur. During the parliamentary war, in the reign of Charles I., this castle was gallantly defended by Sir Richard Philipps for the king; but it had the good fortune to escape the destruction which so many other fortresses experienced. It came by marriage with a descendant of the Wogan family to Sir Thomas Philipps, of Cilsant, father of John, the first baronet, and, on the death of the late Lord Milford, descended to Sir R. B. P. Philipps, Bart., the present proprietor. A little above the village of Slebech the Eastern Cleddy river, on the northern bank of which it is situated, becomes navigable for vessels of considerable burden, and, about four miles below it, joins the Western Cleddy, these two then forming the magnificent haven of Milford. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Baron de Rutzen, who is impropiator of the tithes. The church, formerly the conventual church of the commandery, and the only remaining portion of that ancient establishment, is a venerable and ancient structure, in the Norman style of architecture, pleasantly situated near the bank of the river, and embosomed in the luxuriant groves which surrounded it. It contains some ancient monuments, and also a handsome one of modern erection to the memory of Sir William

Hamilton, and his first wife, who was one of the co-heiresses of the Wogans of Wiston. There is a place of worship for Baptists. The commandery of the knights

St. John of Jerusalem, according to Bishop Tanner, was established here prior to the year 1301, and endowed with lands by Wize and his son Walter: it flourished till the dissolution, when its revenue was estimated at £211. 9. 11. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £198. 19.

SNEAD (SNEYD, or IS NOWDD), a parish chiefly in the lower division of the hundred of MONTGOMERY, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (N.) from Bishop's Castle, containing 57 inhabitants. This parish, of which a few fields are in the county of Salop, is about two miles in length and half a mile in breadth, and is watered by the river Camlet, which forms its northern boundary. The surface is undulated, rising in some parts into bold eminences, and the soil is in general fertile. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, endowed with £450 from the tithes, £400 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Philip Morris, Esq. The church is an ancient edifice, in the early style of English architecture, and was formerly dependent on the priory of Chirbury: it is beautifully situated in a retired spot, and almost concealed from view by the numerous trees of lofty growth by which the churchyard is entirely surrounded: the west end is almost covered with ivy, and the venerable building has a strikingly picturesque appearance on entering the churchyard. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £42. 5.

SOLVA, a small sea-port in the parish of WHITCHURCH, hundred of DEWISLAND, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 12 miles (N. W. by W.) from Haverfordwest. The population is returned with the parish. This place derives its name from its situation near the mouth of the small river Solva, which here discharges itself into the northern part of St. Bride's bay. From the great demand for shipping during the last war, and the convenience of its harbour, it first came into notice, and, from one of the poorest hamlets in this part of the principality, has, within the last forty years, risen into a flourishing little town. The houses, which are of very neat appearance, are built without any regard to regularity of plan, and only those which are situated in the lower part of the valley, in a direction parallel with the river, have the appearance of a street. Within a few hundred yards of the original buildings another town has been erected, occupying the height above the vale, and from that circumstance called Upper Solva. The appearance of the whole is highly interesting, the cottages being of a very neat and comfortable description, and the gardens, laid out in terraces on the acclivity of the hill, and commanding a fine view of the sea, have a very pleasing and picturesque appearance. The harbour is sheltered from the waves of St. Bride's bay by a singular bend at the mouth, and by a large pyramidal rock, which divides the entrance into two narrow passages: it is accessible to ships of five hundred tons' burden, and in cases of emergency ships of a thousand tons might anchor there; but the great rock at its mouth, and the high lands which surround it, appear at a distance as one entire cliff, and render the approach somewhat dangerous, owing to the difficulty in discerning the entrance. Many nautical men are of opinion that, at a very small expense, such improvements might be made as would render it one of the safest and most commodious havens on the coast. There were formerly about thirty vessels of various descriptions belonging to this port, of from twenty to two hundred and fifty tons' burden; but that number is greatly reduced, and at present there are only four brigs, varying from one hundred and fifty to two hundred tons' burden, and a few small craft of from twenty to forty tons. The staple trade of the port is in corn, of which considerable quantities are shipped for the English markets; and in limestone and coal, which are brought from Milford Haven: the limestone is burnt into lime at some kilns near the entrance of the town, for the supply of the surrounding districts. The sand of the harbour, possessing saline properties, is raised in considerable quantity at low water, and landed on the quay, whence it is taken away by the farmers in the neighbourhood, and used as a manure. A small market, chiefly for provisions, is held weekly on Friday.

In this town is the establishment belonging to the lighthouse upon the "Smalls," a cluster of dangerous rocks, about eighteen miles from the Welsh coast, bearing from St. Anne's Point W. N. W., from St. David's W. S. W., and from Gresholm W.  $\frac{3}{4}$  N. These rocks form three distinct reefs, extending parallel to each other in a direction from north-east to south-west, for three-quarters of a mile: their entire breadth in a transverse direction is about a quarter of a mile. The greater number are above water, while others are visible only at half tide: on the largest of the former is the lighthouse, the plan of which was first suggested by Mr. Philipps of Liverpool, and the building erected by Mr. Whitesides, of the same place. It was completed in the year 1775, and its stability was proved by the architect himself, who, in company with two other persons, passed the following winter in it. The lighthouse is an octagonal building, resting upon eight strong oak piles at the angles, and one in the centre: the piles at the north and north-east angles are stayed, to resist the violence of the waves, which sometimes strike the edifice on the opposite side with the whole force of the Atlantic swell. The rock on which it is built is twelve feet above the level of the sea at high water, and the lantern has an elevation of seventy feet: it is lighted by eighteen argand lamps, and in clear weather the light, which is of a red colour, is seen at the distance of five or six leagues, having the appearance of a star of the first magnitude. Beneath the lantern are the store-room and the apartments for the men, who are always three in number, and are furnished with a supply of provisions and stores for six months, as it frequently happens that for many weeks together, during the winter, no boat can reach the rock. The erection of a lighthouse on these dangerous rocks has been attended with the greatest benefit to the navigation of the channel, many lives and much property having been saved since the design was carried into effect. The Smalls belong to no parish, nor are they within any county; but they are nearest to the Welsh coast, and the inhabitants of the lighthouse are considered as parishioners of Whitchurch. On the ridge called the Gribyn, which bounds

the valley of the Solva on the east, are traces of various intrenched encampments; and at the southern extremity, towards the sea, there is a circular intrenchment, surrounded by a rampart of loose stones, which is supposed to be of British origin.

SONTLEY (SONLLI), a township in the parish of MARCHWIEL, hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (S.) from Wrexham, containing 340 inhabitants, the population having increased nearly fourfold since the census of 1821. The very ancient house of Sontley was possessed by a family of the same name, in old writings called Souilly or Sullie, a branch of the Eytons, of Eyton: it was afterwards inhabited by a younger branch of the Broughtons, but is now converted into a farm-house.

SOUGHTON (SYCH-DIN), a township in the parish of NORTHOP, Northop division of the hundred of COLESHILL, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 1 mile (S.) from Northop, containing 421 inhabitants. Soughton Hall, a chaste and unique mansion, erected in 1714, by Dr. John Wynne, Bishop of Bath and Wells, is the residence of W. I. Bankes, Esq., and there are one or two other respectable seats in the vicinity. There is an extensive colliery, giving employment to several of the inhabitants. The Calvinistic Methodists have a place of worship here. An estate in this township was bequeathed by Owen Jones, in 1658, for the instruction and apprenticing of poor boys at Northop. Wat's Dyke enters the parish in this township, and crosses the Mold road at the Soughton toll-gate, taking a course nearly westward for some distance.

SOUTHERNDOWN, a hamlet in the parish of St. BRIDE'S MAJOR, hundred of OGMORE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (S. by W.) from Bridgend, containing 340 inhabitants. This place is situated on the sea-coast, and comprises the southern declivity of a very extensive down. Close to it, on a small promontory, presenting rocky and lofty cliffs, stands Dunraven Castle, once the seat of Thos. Wyndham, Esq., who erected the present spacious and elegant structure, in the early English style, on the site of a more ancient castle, said to have been the oldest in Wales, and once the residence of the celebrated Caractacus, as well as of his father, Brân ab Llyr. It continued occasionally to be the seat of the reguli of this district after the capture of the British hero, and until the Norman conquest of Glamorgan, in the time of Iestyn ab Gwrgan, when, on the partition of that territory by Robert Fitz-Hamon, the castle and manor were assigned to William de Londres, who bestowed them on his butler, afterwards Sir Arnold Butler, one of whose female descendants conveyed them by marriage into the family of the Vaughans, from whom they were purchased by an ancestor of the late Mr. Wyndham, whose only daughter and heiress conveyed them by marriage to Windham Henry Wyndham Quin, Earl of Dunraven and Mountearl: the castle is now the residence of I. W. Bennett, Esq. A lofty embankment across the peninsula, still traceable, protected the castle on the land side, while the bold cliffs rendered it inaccessible from the sea. About a mile westward from Dunraven Castle are three very extraordinary natural caverns, formed by the action of the sea on the projecting rocks. One, termed by pre-eminence "the Cave," is approached from the south by a rude piazza worn through the rock, the appearance of the sea and sky between the rough arches of which has a grand and singular effect. The next is a cavern called the "Wind hole," extending about twenty-seven yards, with two or three fissures in the roof, at a considerable distance from the edge of the cliff; and if a hat or any other light substance be placed on the opening on the top, it will be violently blown into the air. The third has received the name of the "Fairy Cove," from the number of petrefactions which it contains, and which have assumed such a variety of grotesque shapes as to be considered the most curious of the whole. At the western end of the down, which abuts on the Ewenny river, there is another singular object, consisting of a large body of water issuing from the bottom of the down, which foams and boils with much force, and forms two small streams.

SPITTAL, a parish in the hundred of DUNGLEDDBY, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (N. by E.) from Haverfordwest, containing 452 inhabitants. This parish, situated on the Western Cleddy, which forms its boundary on the west, and intersected by the turnpike roads leading from Haverfordwest to Cardigan and Fishguard respectively, comprises a considerable portion of arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and cultivated. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of John Lort Philipps, Esq., and William Edwards Tucker, Esq., the former of whom has two turns, and the latter one. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is not distinguished by any architectural details of importance. There are places of worship for Baptists, Wesleyan Methodists, and Presbyterians. There are several remains of ancient encampments in the parish, which are here called "Rhâths:" of these, one occupies the summit of a conical hill which rises abruptly in the vale: the area, which is nearly circular, is enclosed by a single rampart. Near it was a chapel, dedicated to St. Leonard, which, together with the church of Rudbaxton, was granted by Alexander Rudebac to the commandery of the knights of St. John of Jerusalem, at Slebech. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £122. 15.

SPITTY-YSTRAD-MEURIC, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES.—See YSPITTY-YSTRAD-MEURIC.

SPITTY-YSTWITH, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES.—See YSPITTY-YSTWITH.

STACKPOOL-ELIDUR, a parish in the hundred of CASTLEMARTIN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S.) from Pembroke, containing 348 inhabitants. The name of this place is derived from the Stack rock at the mouth of the Broad Haven, at the head of which it is situated, in the Bristol channel; and its adjunct from St. Elidur, to whom the original foundation of its church is attributed. The parish comprises an extensive tract of good arable and pasture land, in a high state of cultivation; and the scenery, enriched with the beautiful grounds and extensive plantations surrounding the mansion of Stackpool Court, is finely diversified and strikingly picturesque. Stackpool Court, the property and one of the seats of Earl Cawdor, is romantically situated in a deep and richly wooded valley, ornamented with a fine artificial lake, over which is an elegant stone bridge of eight arches.

The present noble mansion, which overlooks the lake, was erected by the great-grandfather of the present Earl Cawdor, the first of the family that settled in Wales, who, by marriage with Miss Lort, the heiress, became possessed of the estate. It is built of hewn limestone, and has an imposing grandeur of appearance, having two spacious and magnificent fronts: along the whole of that which faces the lake a wide terrace has been formed, from which there is a delightful and extensive prospect; and from the other front, in which is the entrance, there is a fine view of the pleasure grounds, which are disposed with great taste. The interior comprises a splendid suite of apartments, and a library containing an extensive collection of rare and valuable works in every department of literature: the gardens are laid out with great taste, and the greenhouses and hothouses are stored with every species of rare and valuable exotics. The park, which is well stocked with deer, is very extensive, and in the grounds there is a large conservatory. The whole of this splendid property has been greatly improved by the present noble proprietor; and the estate, which comprises not less than fifteen thousand acres of rich and valuable land, in the highest state of cultivation, with its luxuriant woods and plantations, forms a distinguished ornament to this part of the principality. The living consists of a rectory and a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's: the rectory, which is a sinecure, is rated in the king's books at £15.12.11., and the vicarage, which is rated at £3.18.4., and discharged, is endowed with £600 royal bounty: both are in the patronage of Earl Cawdor. The church, dedicated to St. Elidur, or, according to some authorities, to St. James, is an ancient structure, containing several monuments to different members of the family of Stackpool Court, among which is one, under a richly sculptured canopy of stone, bearing the effigy of a crusader, said to be that of Sir Elidur de Stackpool, the earliest known proprietor of that estate, and the reputed founder of the church. The interior was richly embellished by an ancestor of the present Earl Cawdor, in 1766. A school, for the gratuitous instruction of all the poor children of this and the adjoining parishes of St. Petrox and Bosheston, is supported by Earl Cawdor. On a tongue of land commanding a branch of the Stackpool æstuary there is a strong encampment, near which, in several places, have been found human bones, a brazen spear-head, and an ancient sword, probably memorials of some of those conflicts which frequently took place along this coast, between the natives and the invaders of their country. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £150.7.

STANAGE, a lordship in that part of the parish of BRAMPTON-BRYAN which is in the hundred of KNIGHTON, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (E.) from Knighton, containing 155 inhabitants. The remainder of the parish is situated in Wigmore hundred, county of Hereford. This lordship, the name of which signifies "the stony edge," forms the most easterly point of South Wales, and lies on the south bank of the river Teme, on the road from Knighton to Ludlow. Stanage Park occupies a fine and extensive eminence: it formerly belonged to the Cornewalls, barons of Burford, but is now the property of — Rogers, Esq. A separate assessment is made for the support of the poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £92.17.

STANSTY, a township in that part of the parish of WREXHAM which is in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (N.) from Wrexham, containing 260 inhabitants. Wat's Dyke enters this township from the south, and, after passing through it to the river Alyn, is continued beyond that river, in the township of Gwersylt, in the parish of Gresford. This place maintains its poor separately, agreeably to an arrangement made in March 1830.

STEYNTON, or STAINTON, a parish in the hundred of RHÔS, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (N. N. E.) from Milford, containing 2984 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the turnpike road from Milford to Haverfordwest, extends to the shore of Milford Haven, by which it is bounded on the south; and Hubberston Pill, an inlet from the haven, is navigable for small craft, at high water, for a considerable distance within its limits. In the southern part of it is situated the borough, market, and sea-port town of Milford, described under its appropriate head, and comprising the chief portion of the population: in the western part of it is St. Botolph's, the seat of A. I. Stokes, Esq., by one of whose relatives it was purchased, in 1826, from the representatives of General le Hunt, who purchased it, in 1803, from the family of the Elliots, to whom it had belonged for many years. The present mansion was built in 1800, about a hundred yards to the west of the ancient edifice, and partly on the site of a monastery supposed to have been a cell to the priory of Pill, near the head of Hubberston Pill. In excavating the ground for the new building several stone coffins, containing bones, were dug up; and part of the walls of the ancient monastery, which are still remaining, have been incorporated with the out-buildings of the modern mansion. Bolton Hill, an ancient seat formerly belonging to a family of that name, is situated in the northern part of the parish, and near an abrupt and lofty eminence called Bolton Beacon. While Cromwell lay at Haverfordwest, two of his soldiers entered this mansion, with the intention of plundering it, and Bolton, who had concealed himself, was denied by his wife to the soldiers, who, nevertheless, suspecting that he was in the house, one of them took up his child, and pretended to throw it on the fire, on which the father rushed from his concealment, and killed the ruffian on the spot: his comrade escaped, and Bolton, on reflection, deemed it prudent to inform Cromwell of all that had occurred, observing to that general, that the man he had killed had only one eye: the latter replied, "The fellow was a great rascal, and you have saved me the trouble of having him executed." Castle Hall, the seat of the Hon. R. Fulke Greville, in the south-eastern part of the parish, was originally built by John Zephaniah Holwell, whose sufferings in the black hole at Calcutta are well known: it is a spacious mansion, and the grounds are extensive and well laid out. The parish is about six miles in length from north to south, and from a mile and a half to two miles in breadth from east to west, and is wholly enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. Culm is found within its limits, and a mine which had been worked for many years, for the supply of the neighbourhood, has been re-opened on Lord Kensington's estate. Great facilities are afforded for the conveyance of the produce of the mine by the navigable creek called Hubberston Pill, and by the main haven. The small village of Pill, distant about a quarter of a mile from the town of Milford, is within the parish.

The living is a discharged vicarage, with the rectory of Johnston consolidated, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The vicarage is endowed with the whole of the great and small tithes of a portion of the parish: the remainder are appropriated to Mrs. Anne Wright, whose family, the Jordans, sold another portion, which now forms part of the income of the incumbent of St. Mary's, Haverfordwest. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, or, as it is stated in the Monasticon, to St. Kewel, and formerly dependent upon Pill priory, is an ancient and venerable structure, with a lofty tower, which, from its elevated situation, is seen from every part of the surrounding country: the interior consists of a nave, chancel, and two aisles, separated by series of massive columns and pointed arches. This edifice was garrisoned with a small number of troops during the parliamentary war in the reign of Charles I. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians. A school is about to be established at a place called Sodston, for children of either sex, with an endowment of £30 per annum by Mr. and Mrs. Devonald, chargeable on certain lands in this parish. Richard Budd, about the year 1633, in consideration of having been saved from shipwreck by taking refuge within Tenby pier, bequeathed to the churchwardens of Tenby the sum of £1. 6. 8. (two marks), to be distributed in bread to the poor of that parish: the payment of this sum is charged upon the estate of St. Botolph's, in this parish; but it does not appear that he was ever the owner of that property. At the head of Prix Pill stood Pill castle, the capture of which is recorded by Fenton: there are no remains of this fortress, but in digging near the site, about seventy years ago, at a place called Cwm, a human skull with an iron ball in it was found; and a tradition is extant that a pond near the spot, now called Deadman's Lake, derived that name from its having been deeply tinged with the blood of the slain on that occasion. Near the head of Hubberston Pill are the remains of Pill priory, founded in the year 1200 by Adam de Rupe, for monks of the order of Tyrone, who afterwards became Benedictines: the priory, which was dedicated to St. Mary and St. Budoc, flourished till the dissolution, at which time its revenue was estimated at £67. 15.: the site and buildings were granted, in the 38th of Henry VIII., to Roger and Thomas Barlow, and are now the property of the Hon. Fulke Greville. The ruins, which are very small, consist chiefly of some fragments of the walls: the low entrance gateway leading into the garden is still remaining, but the arch above it fell down in 1826. At Butter hill, formerly a grange belonging to the priory, there is a family of the name of Roch, who are said to be descended from Adam de Rupe, founder of the priory. There are in the parish several ancient encampments, here called Rhâths: one of these is near the priory; another near Thornton House, the neat residence of the Rev. A. Crymes; and a third, called Old Castle, near the town of Milford; but not one of them is of sufficient importance to require particular notice. Near the ruins of an ancient chapel, dedicated to St. Catherine, a silver coin of Domitian was dug up, about thirty years ago. In 1818, a celt was dug up near St. Botolph's, where also there are some remains of a Druidical altar, called by the country people the Long Stone. Sir William James, Bart., the celebrated naval commander in the East India Company's service, in commemoration of whose achievements the ornamental tower on Shooter's Hill, near London, was erected by his widow, was born at Bolton Hill mill, in this parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £461.

STRATA FLORIDA, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES.—See CARON UWCH CLAWDD.

STRETTON, a township in the parish of HAWARDEN, hundred of MOLD, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (N. W.) from Hawarden, containing 186 inhabitants.

SULLY (SULWY), a parish in the hundred of DINAS POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $6\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. S. W.) from Cardiff, containing 197 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the shore of the Bristol channel, by which it is bounded on the south, and nearly opposite to a small island of the same name. It is of very limited extent, comprising only a moderate portion of arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and in good cultivation. The Scottish system of agriculture, introduced here by Mr. Thomas, of Sully House, who is regarded as one of the best agriculturists in South Wales, is generally adopted in the parish, and has succeeded well. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £11. 9. 9½., and in the patronage of Thomas Tyrwhitt Drake, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is a neat edifice, and is kept in excellent repair: adjoining it is a handsome parsonage-house, occupied by the Rev. Mr. Conybeare, the present rector, who has greatly distinguished himself by his geological researches. Mr. John Howell, in 1775, bequeathed £10 to the poor of this parish not receiving parochial relief. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £92. 12.

SUTTON, a township in the parochial chapelry of IS Y COED, hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (E. by S.) from Wrexham, containing 230 inhabitants. It is situated on the left bank of the river Dee, near where it receives a stream from the westward. The poor are maintained by a separate assessment, the average annual expenditure amounting to £108.

SWANSEA, or EGLWYS - VAIR-ABER-TA-WY, a parish, comprising the Upper and Lower divisions, and the Franchise of Swansea (which latter contains the important borough, market, and sea-port town of the same name), in the hundred of SWANSEA, and the hamlet of St. Thomas, in the hundred of LLANGYVELACH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 44 miles (W. by N.) from Cardiff, 68 (E. by S.) from Milford, and 209 (W.) from Corporation Seal.

London, and containing 14,931 inhabitants, of which number, 13,256 are in the Franchise, 678 in the Higher, and 559 in the Lower, division of the parish, and 438 in the hamlet of St. Thomas. The town, called by the Welsh "Abertawy," from its situation at the mouth of the river Tawe or Tawy, which here discharges its waters into the great bay of Swansea, in the Bristol channel, derived the appellation of "Swinesea," or "Swinesey," according to Camden, from the number of porpoises with which this part of the channel abounded; and of this designation its present name is only a slight modification. After the defeat of Rhys ab Tewdwr by the united forces of Iestyn ab Gwrgan, Prince of Glamorgan, and the Normans under the command of Fitz-Hamon, Conan, natural son of Rhys, having escaped from the scene of carnage with some of his troops, was drowned in the lake of Cremlyn, now an extensive marsh between this place and Briton Ferry, in attempting to pass it in his flight towards Carmarthen. The castle of Swansea, or Abertawe, according to Caradoc of Llancarvan, was built in the year 1099, by Henry Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, with a view to secure possession of those territories, in the province of Gower, which he had wrested by force of arms from the sons of Caradoc ab Iestyn; and on the completion of that fortress, the town is said to have been built by the same nobleman, who, having subsequently reduced the whole province under his dominion, introduced into it colonies of English and Flemings, to garrison the various castles which he had erected for its defence. To these his dependents he gave a large portion of territory, and their descendants, who still retain possession of the ancient settlements, were, until of late years, distinguished by their language, manners, and customs, from the aboriginal inhabitants, with whom they seldom intermarried. The town, from the peculiar advantages of its situation, and its early maritime importance, soon became the capital of the province of Gower: its inhabitants enjoyed many valuable privileges, which were conferred by the early Norman lords, and for some time it continued to flourish with increasing prosperity.

Its importance, and its being regarded as the key to the English possessions in Glamorgan, exposed it to all the horrors of frequent warfare, and subjected it to repeated desolation and rapine. In 1113, this place was furiously assaulted by Rhys ab Gruffydd, who, after fruitless attempts to reduce the castle, which, from the strength of its fortifications and the number of its garrison, resisted all his efforts, set fire to the town, and laid waste the surrounding country. Early in the thirteenth century it was more successfully attacked by Rhys Vychan, who, being assisted by Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, finally succeeded in destroying all the fortresses which had been erected by the Normans within the province of Gower. In reference to the desolation which Swansea suffered upon these occasions, Llywarch ab Llewelyn, in a panegyric ode addressed to the victor, has these remarkable words: "In Swansea, that peaceless town, the towers are rent, and now peace prevails there: in strongly fortified Swansea, the key of England, all the women are widows." From this dreary state of devastation the town, however, soon recovered, and was again besieged, in the year 1260, by Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, the last prince of North Wales, who, coming against it with a powerful army, entirely demolished the castle, which, according to the testimony of most historians, lay from that time in ruins till the prelate of Henry Gower, Bishop of St. David's, who restored it, besides building the palace of St. David's, and enlarging and embellishing the episcopal residence at Lamphey. A similar style of architecture and embellishment is observable in these three buildings, which are all distinguished by a beautiful open parapet, pierced alternately in pointed and circular Norman arches, a peculiarity of feature, which is characteristic of all the buildings erected by that munificent prelate. In 1331, Bishop Gower, who was a native of this province, founded an hospital at this place, in honour of St. David, which continued to flourish till the dissolution, at which time its revenue was estimated at £20. After the death of that prelate, Swansea, being so remote from the seat of the diocese, and there being not less than seven palaces in different places belonging to the see, the castle, during the prelate of his successor, was neglected, and went rapidly to decay. In the reign of Henry IV., the town suffered materially during the insurrection raised against that monarch by Owain Glyndwr, by whom it was burnt, and the neighbourhood reduced to a state of desolation. During the parliamentary war in the reign of Charles I., Oliver Cromwell visited this place, on his route to embark for Ireland, and is said to have taken up his abode in a house in the High-street, which, till very lately, was occupied as a place of worship by a congregation of Wesleyan Methodists.

The town is beautifully and advantageously situated in an angle between two lofty hills, on the western bank of the river Tawy, which is here navigable for ships of large burden, and at the head of a noble bay to which it gives name, extending for nearly nine miles in breadth from east to west, and sheltered by an amphitheatre of hills from the most unfavourable winds. The principal thoroughfare through it extends for more than a mile in a direction parallel with the river; and the streets diverging from it, which are numerous and in some instances spacious, are well paved, and lighted with gas, under the provisions of an act of parliament obtained for that purpose in 1809. The houses are neatly and substantially built, especially those in High-street, Castle-street, and Wind-street, which are the principal streets for business. From these numerous smaller streets branch off in various directions, some of them leading to a populous district towards the west, in the neighbourhood of the new market-place. Among the numerous ranges of building in the more retired parts of the town are, Belle Vue, an assemblage of detached houses of handsome elevation, with several pleasing villas, occupying a delightful eminence, and commanding a fine view of the sea and the distant coasts of Somerset and Devon; the Burrows, comprising several ranges of respectable houses of modern erection, inhabited by genteel families; and a continuation of handsome buildings, both in the upper and lower roads leading to the Mumbles, a pleasant village about five miles from the town, the road to which is, throughout the whole distance, under an elevated ridge, thickly studded with elegant seats and substantial dwellings. Considerable additions have been made to the town within the last few years, several new streets having been formed, and numerous detached residences erected:

a very considerable portion of land in the neighbourhood has also been appropriated as building ground, and some streets of neat houses and ornamental cottages upon it are already occupied. The beautiful situation of the town on the margin of a fine open bay, with extensive, firm, smooth, and level sands, presenting an interesting and pleasant marine promenade, the salubrity of the air, the beauty of the surrounding scenery, and the excellent accommodations which the town affords, have contributed to render it a favourite place of resort for sea-bathing; and the opportunities of aquatic excursions which the bay affords, and the numerous pleasant rides and walks in the immediate vicinity, extending through a tract of country abounding with picturesque scenery and romantic beauty, attract to this place, during the summer season, a numerous company of fashionable visitors, for whose accommodation and amusement adequate provision has been made in the erection of public rooms, and hot and cold sea water baths, furnished with every requisite appendage. The Cambrian Society, for the encouragement of researches in geology, mineralogy, and natural history, was established in 1821, under the patronage of the Duke of Beaufort, and the nobility and gentry of the neighbourhood, and contains a number of eminent scientific honorary members. A geological arrangement of the several rocks, according to the Wernerian system, and a geological map of England and Wales by Greenhow, were purchased for the use of the society, and deposited in a room at the infirmary, where they have remained for some years in disuse, the non-residence of most of the members, and a want of energy in the others, having retarded the progress of the society, which, though professedly existing, seldom holds any regular meetings, or makes any advances in the prosecution of the original design. A society for the cultivation of pure Welsh literature, and a critical study of the Welsh language, was established here some few years ago; but for want of sufficient encouragement it has been suffered to decline, and is at present but little regarded. A branch of the Glamorganshire and Monmouthshire Horticultural Society, for the encouragement of improvements in the growth of fruits, flowers, and vegetables, by a distribution of premiums among the most successful candidates, was established here some time since: this society held its last meeting about two years ago, but no further proceedings have taken place, and it appears, like the others, to be falling into disuse. A mechanics' institute, which was established within the last few years, is also on the decline; no meeting of its members having been held, nor any affairs transacted for some time. The assembly-rooms, in Cambrian-place, comprise a suite of five spacious and handsomely arranged apartments, consisting of a ball-room elegantly fitted up, in which concerts are also occasionally performed, and a card-room on the first floor, and having on the basement story, a reading-room, a billiard-room, and a club-room, which are well attended. The theatre, a neat and commodious structure, is entitled to rank among those of the second class out of the metropolis; it is opened during the season by a portion of the Bath and Bristol Company, and is occasionally visited by some of the principal London performers, who, during the recess of the winter theatres, attend here in their provincial tours. Races occasionally take place on the Cremlyn Burrows, and are continued for two days: the time of the meeting is regulated by the English races, upon which they are in a great measure dependent. The principal prizes are, a tradesmen's plate, of which the value is uncertain, and a subscription purse, of which the amount necessarily fluctuates: the course, which is well adapted for two-mile heats, is upon these occasions numerously attended, but the races are so entirely dependent upon the influence and liberality of the stewards, that they cannot be considered as fixed either with respect to the period of being held, or to the stakes which may be run for. An annual regatta is celebrated, generally in August, and is continued for three days, during which, as also during the races, balls and concerts are held at the assembly-rooms, and dramatic performances are exhibited at the theatre.

This town has risen, with a rapidity unparalleled in the history of the principality, from a comparatively insignificant place to a degree of commercial and manufacturing importance which may well entitle it to be considered not only as the chief town in the county of Glamorgan, but as the metropolis of South Wales. About a century ago it had only a manufacture of straw plat, which was conducted upon a very limited scale; and its port, at that time a creek dependent on the port of Cardiff, was noted only for the exportation of coal, which was conveyed from the pits in the neighbourhood to the shipping-place by means of packhorses: and so deeply-rooted was the prejudice of the inhabitants, at this time, in favour of their accustomed mode of conveyance that, on the introduction of waggons by an ancestor of the present Sir John Morris, in the early part of the last century, they threatened to indict him for a nuisance, affirming that "the motion of his cumbrous machines disturbed the beer in their cellars." For its advancement and almost unprecedented commercial prosperity this place is not less indebted to the mineral treasures abounding in its neighbourhood, than to its highly advantageous maritime situation. The vast stores of coal, culm, ironstone, limestone, rotten-stone, flags, fire-clay, and other mineral productions throughout the district, combining with its local facilities of intercourse by sea, first attracted public attention, and led to the establishment of furnaces for the smelting of copper-ore, which were conducted with such complete success that Swansea soon became the principal seat of the copper trade of Great Britain. The whole annual produce of the copper mines of the United Kingdom is estimated at sixteen thousand tons of fine copper, of which the mines of Cornwall and Devonshire produce fourteen thousand, the remaining two thousand tons being the produce of the mines of Anglesey, Cumberland, and Ireland; and of this Anglesey furnishes by far the largest portion. The average richness of the ores is about  $8\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., and the number of tons of ore smelted annually, including the poor ores containing fluor spar, and smelted as a flux, is about two hundred thousand tons. Of the whole ore produced in Great Britain, nineteen-twentieths are smelted at Swansea, and at Llanelly, Neath, Aberavon, and Loughor, all within twelve miles of this town; and the other twentieth part is smelted in Anglesey, where there are furnaces for reducing the ores found in that island. With the exception of some recently erected near Liverpool, for smelting the ore from the Bolivian mines in Columbia, there are no other copper smelting furnaces in the empire than those above enumerated; and of these so much more extensive are the works at this place than all the others taken collectively, that of the whole quantity of ore produced in Great Britain, five-sevenths are smelted in Swansea alone. Although it has been supposed that the art of manufacturing copper was known in this country at a very early period, and some old excavations for copper-ore in Anglesey have been attributed to the Romans, yet the practice was entirely neglected, and the art altogether lost, till within the last one hundred and sixty years, when it was restored by Sir Clement Clarke, who in 1670 first erected works for the smelting of copper-ore, in Cornwall; but, from the scarcity of fuel, they were soon after removed to the Hot Wells near Bristol. Other furnaces and smelting-works were soon after erected at Crew's-hole, near Bristol, and subsequently at Redbrook, on the river Wye, near Monmouth. At this time the Cornish miners were unacquainted with the true nature of the copper-ore, which they called "Poder," and when they met with it, in working for tin, it was thrown away as useless. To Mr. Coster, the agent and successor of Sir Clement Clarke, is ascribed the discovery of the value of the "Poder," or copper-ore, the promulgation of which has tended so greatly to increase the prosperity of the county of Cornwall, and of the copper-smelting districts of South Wales.

From such inconsiderable beginnings has the copper trade of the kingdom advanced to its present extent and importance; the annual produce of this trade, estimated at the present low price of copper, amounts to between a million and a quarter and a million and a half sterling, of which about £800,000 is received annually for what is exported to foreign countries, as Great Britain supplies at least one-half of the copper used in the known world. The first works for smelting copper-ore, established in South Wales, were erected in 1700, by Mr. Turner, near Neath Abbey; the next were built at Melingryddan, near Neath, by Sir Henry Mackworth and Co.; and the first which were erected in the immediate neighbourhood of this town were built on the site of the present Cambrian pottery, by Mr. Phillips, in 1719. To these succeeded the Landore works, on the site of the present Landore foundry, and afterwards were successively erected, the Forest, White Rock, Middle Bank, Upper Bank, Ynis, Rose, and Hâvod works. Villages have arisen in the vicinity of all these works, and the town of Swansea has, within the last thirty years, increased in population from 6099 to 13,694. At this place there are at present, in full operation, the following extensive smelting-works: viz., the Forest works, belonging to the Forest Copper Company; the Ynis works, to the Birmingham Copper Company; the Rose works, to Messrs. Williams, Foster, and Company; the Landore works, to Messrs. Bath, Nevill, and Company; the Upper Bank works, to Owen Williams, Esq.; the Hâvod works, to Messrs. Vivian and Sons; the Middle Bank works, to Messrs. P. Grenfell and Company; and the White Rock works, to Messrs. Freeman and Company. There are also four very large rolling establishments on the Swansea river, for the manufacture of sheet copper. A very considerable number of vessels are constantly employed in conveying the ores from the different mines in England and

Ireland to the several smelting places in South Wales; and in transporting the copper, when smelted, to the different markets; and it is calculated that the average expense of conducting the entire copper trade, in South Wales, is at least £300,000 per annum, exclusively of purchasing the ores. The number of persons employed in all the copper mines of Great Britain is about ninety thousand. The ore raised in the greatest quantity is the pyrites of copper, or yellow copper-ore, which, upon analysis, is found to contain one-third part of copper, one-third part of iron, and one-third of sulphur. In separating the copper from this proportion of sulphur, which is effected by sublimation, sulphureous and other gases are evolved, and very large sums of money have been expended in repeated attempts to obviate this result, but only with a trifling degree of success, and experiments are still being made in the hope of ultimately accomplishing so desirable an object. Though the smoke emitted from the copper-works is injurious to vegetation, it has not been found prejudicial to health; but, on the contrary, it appears that agues and fevers, which were formerly endemic in the low and swampy grounds in the neighbourhoods where these works have been erected, have, since their establishment, materially decreased; and no situations have been found more generally favourable to health and longevity. The bituminous and stone coal of this district are peculiarly adapted to the purpose of smelting copper, and carrying on the numerous other works established here. In addition to the copper-works there are, the iron-works belonging to the Milbrook and Landore Iron Companies, two very extensive potteries, and other establishments, in which collectively not less than three thousand men are regularly employed, exclusively of those engaged in the mines and in the shipping. The adjacent district abounds with collieries, employing a very considerable number of men, though the continual fluctuation to which they are liable renders even a remote estimate of the exact number impracticable. The produce of these collieries gives rise to a trade of such extent as to afford business in the harbour for nine shippers of stone coal, seven of binding coal, and four of culm. Ship-building and the repairing of vessels are also carried on to a considerable extent; and commodious and spacious yards have been formed for these purposes, in which many persons are constantly employed. There are also extensive rope-yards, tanneries, breweries, limeworks, and numerous other establishments connected with the manufactures and general commerce of the town.

From these various sources arises the trade of the port of Swansea, which is consequently very extensive, and has been for several years rapidly increasing. The principal exports are, copper, iron, coal, culm, lime, and earthenware, which are shipped hence to various parts of the kingdom, but the copper chiefly to London: the chief imports are, copper-ore from Cornwall, Devonshire, Cumberland, and Ireland; timber, from America and the Baltic; hemp, tallow, flour, and miscellaneous goods from London, Liverpool, and Bristol; and also flour, grain, and provisions from the south of Ireland. The number of vessels belonging to the port is one hundred and twenty-two: according to the official returns for the year ending January 5th, 1831, three thousand five hundred and eighty-eight British (including different arrivals of the same), and one hundred and sixteen foreign, vessels cleared outwards; and two thousand two hundred and thirty-four British (reckoning as above), and forty-three foreign, vessels entered inwards, at this port. During that year also one thousand six hundred and ten British (according to the same mode of calculation), and thirty-five foreign, vessels cleared outwards; and eight hundred and sixty-six British vessels, and one foreign, entered inwards, at the various creeks dependent upon the port of Swansea. The total amount of duties paid during the same year at the custom-house was £4,767. 18. 7. The situation of the port is in every respect admirably adapted for carrying on a very extensive commerce, and very considerable sums have been expended in its improvement. The first attempt of this kind was made under the authority of an act of parliament obtained in the year 1791, for "enlarging and preserving the harbour of Swansea," the original powers of which were extended by two additional statutes subsequently obtained. Under the provisions of these acts of parliament two massive stone piers were constructed at the mouth of the river; one on the western side, extending three hundred yards in length, and the other on the eastern, extending six hundred yards, leaving an entrance between them eighty yards in width. At the head of the western pier there is a lighthouse, which by night displays a light, and by day a black ball, as long as there is a depth of eight feet of water above the bar. At high water the harbour forms a noble and spacious basin, capable of containing a great number of vessels of large burden; but at low water, and for two hours before and after, it is nearly dry, the river during this time being fordable. Among other numerous and important improvements which have been undertaken to promote the commercial prosperity of the town, much has been done within the last century towards enlarging and deepening the harbour; and it is at present in contemplation to convert it into a floating haven, capable of receiving ships of greater burden: the execution of this design, however, has been suspended, owing to a misunderstanding between the shippers of coal and the provisional committee, with respect to the rate of tolls. Notwithstanding the vast expense which must necessarily attend this important undertaking, and the difficulties that have hitherto retarded its progress, there is very little doubt of its being ultimately carried into effect. Both the custom-house and the commercial rooms, though spacious, and internally well adapted to the purposes to which they are respectively applied, are not distinguished by their architecture from the private houses in the town.

On the north-east of the harbour is Port Tennant, so named from the gentleman by whom it was originally projected, and at whose expense it was constructed, in the year 1826: it contains two spacious docks, in which the water is of sufficient depth for vessels of two hundred tons' burden, opening on one side into the basin, and communicating on the other with the Swansea and Neath Junction canal, which is also the property of H. T. Tennant, Esq., of Cadoxton Lodge. The river Tawy is navigable, for vessels of three hundred tons' burden, for two miles from its mouth, and one mile farther for small sloops and barges. On the western bank of the river are spacious and commodious quays, wharfs, warehouses, stores for timber, a dry dock, and every accommodation requisite for the prompt despatch of business. Great facility of communication between the various works and the harbour is afforded by means of canals and tram-roads, by which the produce is conveyed to the port, in order to be shipped to its destination. The Swansea canal, constructed under the provisions of an act of parliament obtained in the year 1794, and completed in 1798, commences near the mouth of the Tawy, and extends up the valley of this river for seventeen miles, passing by Landore and the copper-works at Morriston, crossing the small river Twrch by an aqueduct of four arches, and terminating at Hên Noyadd, in the parish of Ystradgynlais, in the county of Brecknock. In the line of its course from Swansea to Pont ar Tawy, a distance of eight miles and a quarter, there is a rise of one hundred and five feet; and from that place to Pont Gwaynclawdd, a distance of eight miles, there is a rise of two hundred and thirty-seven feet, making, together with a rise of thirty-one feet in the remaining distance, a total rise in its whole length of three hundred and seventy-three feet. The Swansea and Neath Junction canal, constructed in 1789 by H. T. Tennant, Esq., originally formed a direct communication between Swansea and Briton-Ferry, falling into the Neath river at a short distance above that village: it was subsequently, however, diverted up Cwm Neath by an abrupt turn to the north-east, and now joins the Neath canal at a place called Aberdylais, about two miles above Neath, after crossing the Neath river by a magnificent stone aqueduct of thirteen arches, the only one on a line nine miles in length: this alteration was completed, and the new line opened, in 1824. Numerous rail-roads from the collieries in the neighbourhood of the canals and the river complete the extensive chain of inland communication, and afford a facility of conveying the produce of the various works in this extensive mineral and manufacturing district to the ports of Swansea and Neath: a tram-road has also been constructed from the lower extremity of the Swansea canal to the limestone quarries at Oystermouth, a distance of more than five miles.

The markets are held on Wednesday and Saturday; the latter is for corn, but is also abundantly supplied with provisions of every kind: fish is exposed for sale daily, but the fish here is not considered to be of so good a quality as on other parts of the coast, a circumstance which is attributed to the prevalence of sand in the neighbourhood of the shore. Fairs are held annually on May 2nd, July 2nd, August 15th, and October 30th. The new market-place, though not yet completed, was opened to the public in 1830: it occupies a plot of ground given for that purpose by Calvert Jones, Esq., and comprises a quadrilateral area, three hundred and twenty feet in length, and two hundred and twenty feet wide, enclosed by a lofty stone wall with spacious and convenient entrances: along the walls are ranged the shambles for butchers' meat, consisting of eighty-nine stalls. The central portion of the area is divided into compartments furnished with long tables, each sheltered by a penthouse roof, supported by cast iron pillars: in these compartments are exposed for sale fish, poultry, eggs, butter, fruit, vegetables, flannel, boots and shoes, and almost every other article of provisions, pedlery, and merchandise: the area is flagged, and in the centre it is intended to erect a market-house containing a committee-room and other requisite apartments, which will be surmounted by a handsome turret, in which will be placed a clock. The whole expense of erecting this building, which is of such essential importance to so populous a town, is defrayed by the corporation, and is supposed, at a moderate estimate, to amount at least to the sum of £20,000.

Swansea is a borough by prescription, and the various privileges which it had acquired at different times have been confirmed and extended by successive charters, from the time of Henry III., by whom the first royal charter of incorporation was granted, to the reign of James II., by whose charter the government of the borough is vested in a portreeve, recorder, twelve aldermen, and an unlimited number of burgesses, assisted by a town-clerk, two common attorneys, who together act as chamberlain, two serjeants at mace, and other officers. The portreeve, who is also clerk of the market, is elected annually on the eve of the festival of St. Michael, by the steward of the lord of the manor, who appoints to that office one of two candidates presented to him by the burgesses at large, and selected by them from four individuals nominated for that purpose by the aldermen. The portreeve may, under the provisions of an act of parliament passed in the year 1791, for the improvement of the harbour, qualify as a magistrate within the borough; but he is not, ex officio, a justice of the peace. The corporation possess a considerable estate in land; they also claim all the waste lands within the limits of the borough, and a right to certain customary tolls and dues, sanctioned by immemorial usage, producing in general from £700 to £800 per annum, which is enjoyed by the portreeve for the time being, to defray the contingent expenses of his office. This borough, together with Aberavon, Cowbridge, Kenvig, Llantrissant, Loughor, and Neath, was made contributory to the borough of Cardiff, as the county town, in returning one member to parliament, by the 27th of Henry VIII., and the right of voting vested in the burgesses generally. During Cromwell's usurpation it sent one member to parliament independently of the other boroughs; as it appears that, in 1658-9, William Fox, one of Cromwell's judges of assize on the Brecknock circuit, was chosen representative for Swansea exclusively. After the Restoration it resumed its former character as a contributory borough, and has continued to participate with the other boroughs in the return of a member to parliament to the present time; the right of election having hitherto been in the burgesses generally, in number about one hundred and ten. By the recent act to amend the representation, Swansea has been made the head of a new district of boroughs, including those of Swansea, Aberavon, Kenvig, Loughor, and Neath; and the right of exercising the franchise is now vested in the resident burgesses only, in number about sixty, if duly registered according to the provisions of the act, and in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of at least ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act demands: the present number of tenements of this value, within the extended electoral limits of the borough, is about one thousand. The new limits, which are minutely detailed in the Appendix, include, on account of the increased populousness of the vicinity, in addition to the ancient town and franchise of Swansea, the parish of St. John, the hamlet of St. Thomas, part of the parish of Lower Llansamlet, and the modern town of Morriston, in that of Llangyvelach. The freedom of the borough is inherited by all the sons of a freeman, born after his admission; obtained by marriage with a freeman's daughter; and acquired by a servitude of seven years' apprenticeship to a resident freeman, or by presentation of a jury of burgesses. The corporation hold a court of pleas by prescription, recognized by statute of the 34th and 35th of Henry VIII., every month, for the recovery of debts above the amount of forty shillings, in which the portreeve presides either in person or by deputy, together with the recorder, or the steward of the lord of the manor: this court has power to issue process to hold to bail in actions for debt, the amount to be not less than twenty pounds, as altered by statute of the 7th and 8th of George IV., and its jurisdiction extends over the town and franchise. The steward of the manor holds a court baron every three weeks, for the recovery of debts under forty shillings, the jurisdiction of which extends over the seignior of Gower and the manor of Kilvey. The town is under the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, who hold a petty session for the hundred of Swansea, every Tuesday, in the town-hall, where also are held the Michaelmas quarter sessions for the county. Swansea is likewise one of the places at which, under the recent act, the poll is to be taken at the county elections. The town-hall, erected in 1827, at the expense of the burgesses, is a neat substantial building, with a front of freestone, ornamented with a receding portico of the Doric order: it contains a well-arranged suite of rooms for the holding of the several courts, and for the transaction of the public business of the corporation. The house of correction for the western part of the county, also erected in the year 1827, at an expense of £3750, defrayed by the county, and situated in a healthy spot on the shore, within a quarter of a mile of the town, is a substantial stone building, well adapted for the reception of fifty prisoners, for the proper classification of whom every facility has been provided: it comprises thirty-six sleeping-cells, four day-rooms, and six airing-yards, in one of which there is a tread-wheel.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £7. 14. 4½., endowed with £200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Sir John Morris, Bart., who is the lay impropriator: the tithes formerly belonged to the hospital of St. David's, in this town, but in the reign of Edward VI. they were, together with the other possessions of that establishment, after its dissolution, granted to Sir George Herbert, and are now divided between the impropriator and the vicar, of whom the former has two-thirds, and the latter one-third. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, from which circumstance the parish derives its Welsh name of "Eglwys Vair Aber-Tawy," having become greatly dilapidated, fell down in the year 1739, and was then almost entirely rebuilt. The present is a plain neat structure, in the later style of English architecture: the interior is well arranged and appropriately embellished: in the chancel, which is the only remaining portion of the old edifice, is an east window in the decorated style: the altar is ornamented with a valuable Madonna, presented to the parish by the late Thomas Bowdler, Esq., editor of the Family Shakespeare, and, according to a tablet recording the gift, supposed by the donor to have been an original painting by Sassaferrat, the companion picture of which was sold for £750; some connoisseurs, however, ascribe it to Ludovico Caracci. The internal arrangement is well adapted to the reception of a numerous congregation; but since the amazing increase in the population of the town, which has been progressive for some years, it is quite inadequate to the accommodation of the parishioners. The parish church of St. John juxta Swansea is also situated within the town, and, from the service being performed in it in the Welsh, as well as in the English, language, affords considerable accommodation to the inhabitants of this part of the town, who are mostly of the poorer class, and speak only the Welsh language, and also in a great degree compensates for the deficiency of accommodation in the parish church of St. Mary. There are two places of worship each for English and Welsh Baptists; two for English, and one for Welsh Independents; two each for the Society of Friends and the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists; one each for members of Lady Huntingdon's connexion, Unitarians, and Unitarian Baptists; a Roman Catholic chapel; and a Jews' synagogue.

The free grammar school was founded in 1682, by the Rev. Hugh Gore, D.D., Lord Bishop of Waterford and Lismore, who endowed it with lands in the parish of Llandyvodog, in this county, now producing £100 per annum, which endowment has been augmented with £40 per annum by the corporation. The bishop appointed Bussey Mansel, of Briton-Ferry, Esq., trustee and patron of the school, with power to appoint and remove the master, which power he made perpetual in the proprietors of that estate, and, during their minority, in the Bishop of St. David's: the master becomes ineligible as soon as he obtains a benefice. The school is open for the gratuitous instruction of twenty boys, sons of the poorest burgesses, and, in the event of a dissolution of the corporation, to sons of the poorest inhabitants of the town. National schools for the instruction of children of both sexes are supported by subscription. A school for the gratuitous instruction of girls of all religious denominations, on the plan of the British and Foreign schools in London, was established in 1820, by subscription among the Society of Friends, the funds and the superintendence being vested in trustees, members of that society: a commodious school-room has been built, capable of receiving from two hundred to three hundred children: there are at present one hundred and thirty girls in the school, who are taught reading, writing, arithmetic, plain needlework, and knitting, by a mistress who receives a salary of £40 per annum. An infants' school was established here in 1832, under the immediate patronage of the Duchess of Beaufort, and is conducted by a committee of ladies of the town and neighbourhood: a school-room, capable of receiving two hundred children, and a cottage for the master and mistress, have been erected, at an expense, including the fitting up, of £420, on a site granted on lease for sixty years, at a nominal rent, by the Duke of Beaufort. This institution will be open to the children of parents of all religious denominations; and a man and his wife are at present in course of preparation at the school patronized by the Rev. F. Close, at Cheltenham, to qualify them to perform the duties of master and mistress, for which, in addition to the cottage, rent free, they will receive a salary of £60 per annum. Sunday schools also, in connexion with the established church and the several dissenting congregations, are supported by subscription. An infirmary for the relief of the sick and lame poor from every part of the kingdom, whose cases might require the aid of warm or cold sea-bathing, was established here in 1817, and is principally supported by subscriptions, amounting at present only to £500 per annum, a sum very inadequate to the accomplishment of the object it had in view, upon a scale commensurate with its importance, as the only establishment of the kind in the principality. The affairs of the institution are under the management of a committee, and the medical department comprises the gratuitous attendance of two physicians and two surgeons, exclusively of a resident surgeon, who receives a regular stipend. The funds have not yet been sufficient to warrant the erection of a separate building for its use, and the business of the infirmary is at present conducted in a part of the house of industry. There are also other benevolent institutions established in the town, among which are the Infants' Friend Society, instituted some years since for the relief of distressed women during their confinement, and for supplying infant apparel; and the Dorcas Society, for the gratuitous clothing of the destitute poor. Among the religious benevolent associations are, the Bible Society, the Religious Tract Society, the Seamen's Bethel Union, and the Association in aid of the Irish Sunday schools. Gabriel Powell, in 1733, bequeathed a rent-charge of £5, to be distributed among twenty-five poor persons of the parish; Captain John Price bequeathed £200 for apprenticing poor children; Dr. Miller left a rent-charge of £1. 4., and there are several other charitable donations and bequests, the produce of which is annually distributed among the poor, according to the intention of the several benefactors.

The remains of the ancient castle, situated on an eminence now nearly in the centre of the town, are so surrounded with buildings, that little more of them can be seen, to any advantage, than a lofty circular tower, from the summit of which a beautiful and extensive view is obtained over the bay of Swansea and the adjacent country: to the east of this tower are extensive remains of the ancient state apartments, distinguished by the elegant open parapet said to be the work of Bishop Gower: the apartments, which are still habitable, are appropriated to the confinement of debtors. Near the castle are the ruins of the ancient mansion of the lords of Gower, formerly occupying a spacious quadrangular area, through which a street has been carried, leaving now but few remains by which any thing more than the extent of the buildings can be traced. Here was formerly an ancient hospital, dedicated to St. David, and endowed for twelve poor people, the original foundation of which is by some writers attributed to Bishop Gower, and by others to Elinor de Breos, in the reign of Edward II.: it was endowed with the tithes of the parish, with the lordship of Brinavel, and with lands and tenements in the hamlet of Sketty, in the parish of Swansea, and also in the environs of the town, and at the dissolution had a revenue estimated at £20. There are numerous gentlemen's seats and elegant villas in the immediate vicinity of the town: Singleton, the seat of I. H. Vivian, Esq., situated at the distance of two miles, on the road to the Mumbles, is an elegant and spacious mansion, in the later style of English architecture, erected at different periods by the present proprietor, and is now one of the most complete and best built houses in the county. The grounds, which are very extensive, are laid out with great taste, and embellished with some beautiful cottages after Swiss and Italian designs: the variety and beauty of the scenery within the limits of the demesne are judiciously displayed in the construction of the walks through the pleasure grounds, and the distant views obtained from several points are finely diversified and strikingly picturesque. Sketty Park, the seat of Sir John Morris, Bart., is a handsome and substantially built mansion, situated in finely varied grounds of considerable extent. Sketty Hall, the seat of L. W. Dilwyn, Esq., and Veranda, the residence of Ireland Jones, Esq., are both elegant residences pleasingly situated amidst flourishing plantations; and among various others, which constitute a rich assemblage in the vicinity, too numerous for a detailed description, are, Park Wern, the seat of Captain Hickey, R. N.; Bryn y Môr, that of Robert Eaton, Esq.; St. Helen's, that of Mrs. Jones; Upland Villa, the residence of Henry Lucas, Esq.; Pant y Gwydir, belonging to David Tennant, Esq.; and Hill House, the property of J. W. Wheatly, Esq. All these are situated on the road between Swansea and the beautiful village of Oystermouth, in which is Woodlands Castle, the seat of J. Berrington, Esq.

Near the town there is a chalybeate spring, called Swansea Spa, which was formerly much resorted to for the highly medicinal properties of the water, though at present it is not much frequented, having almost fallen into disuse. In the Caswell rocks upon the coast, and within six miles of the town, there is a remarkably fine spring, which, though always overflowed by the sea at high water, retains not, on its retiring, the slightest saline admixture. In the parish of Swansea, and the lordship of Gower, within which it is included, many eminent and highly distinguished individuals have been born. Henry Gower, D. D., Bishop of St. David's, celebrated not less for the elegance of his taste than for his munificent patronage of the fine arts, was a native of one of them, as also was probably John Gower, the poet, who flourished towards the close of the fourteenth century. Both these distinguished characters were descendants of Gruffydd de Gower, a Welsh chieftain of one of the ancient royal houses, and founder of a family in Gower, distinguished alike for opulence and power, in the beginning of the thirteenth century. Henry de Swinesey, abbot of Glastonbury, whose epitaph on the tomb of the renowned Arthur, at Glastonbury, is noticed by Leland, was born in this town. Richard Nash, more generally known by the appellation of Beau Nash, was born at a house in Goat-street, in the year 1673: his mother was niece of the unfortunate Colonel Poyer, who, after the taking of Penbroke castle by the parliamentarians, during the civil war in the reign of Charles I., was shot at Covent Garden in London. Mr. Nash acquired his celebrity at Bath, where for many years he filled the office of master of the ceremonies with so much dignified urbanity and scrupulous impartiality, that he gained the esteem and respect of all ranks: he died at Bath, in the year 1760, and was honoured with a public funeral in the abbey church of that city. Hugh Gore, D. D., founder of the grammar school, was rector of the parish of Oxwich, in the lordship of Gower: being ejected from his living during the usurpation of Cromwell, he retired to Swansea, where he for some time kept a school. After the Restoration he was advanced to the see of Waterford and Lismore, which he held till the reign of James II., when he retired from his bishoprick, and settled at this town, where he died, and was buried in the parish church. Each of the divisions of the parish separately maintains its own poor; the town and franchise at an average annual expenditure of £2258. 8.; the upper and lower divisions by a similar expenditure of £314; and the hamlet of St. Thomas, by that of £43. 6.; making a total, for the whole parish, of £2615. 14. The poor of the franchise are maintained in a commodious house of industry by the sea side, in which they are all classed according to their ages, and employed according to their abilities, the produce of their labour being appropriated towards defraying the expense of their maintenance; and the establishment, which is regularly conducted under the provisions of an act of parliament, called Gilbert's Act, has been productive of benefit, both to the poor and to the rate-payers.

SWYDD, a joint township with Graig, in the parish of LLANDEGLAY, hundred of KEVENLLEECE, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 1 mile (E. N. E.) from Penybont, containing, with Graig, 227 inhabitants. It forms the northern portion of the parish, which borders on the ancient forest of Radnor, and lies between the left bank of the Cymaron brook and the lofty and mountainous range of that district. Within a recess of these mountains are the Llandeglay wells, once highly esteemed for their medicinal efficacy, but not much frequented at present.

T.

TACH-LLENAN (TACHLEIAN), a joint hamlet with Rhiw-Llâs, in that part of the parish of LLANDILO-VAWR which is in the lower division of the hundred of CAYO, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 2½ miles (N.) from Llandilo-Vawr, containing 221 inhabitants. The name implies "a spreading to the westward," being descriptive of the situation of this hamlet in the parish. It is assessed with Rhiw-Llâs for the joint maintenance of the poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £97. 1.

TÂF, a joint hamlet with Cynon, in the parish of MERTHYR-TYDVIL, hundred of CAERPHILLY, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (S.) from Merthyr-Tydvil. The population is included in the return for the entire parish. In this hamlet the Glamorganshire canal proceeds along the vale of the Tâf, to Merthyr-Tydvil; and from this, immediately below it, branches the Aberdare canal, through the valley of the Cy-non, to Aberdare. To connect these lines of navigation with the main trunk from Cardiff there is a fine aqueduct over the river Tâf, near where it is crossed by a bridge on the road to those places. The banks of the Tâf are here finely wooded, presenting some beautiful views and several agreeable residences, especially in the vale of the Cynon. A portion of this hamlet is included within the limits of the new borough of Merthyr-Tydvil.

TALACHDDŪ (TĀL-ACHDDŪ), a parish in the hundred of PENCELLY, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. E.) from Brecknock, on the road to Hay, containing 177 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises about one thousand five hundred and fifty acres of land, derives its name from its situation at the head of a small rivulet called the Achddŭ, from the black colour of its water, and is separated from the adjacent parish of Llandeulley by the river Dulais, which, at the little village of Velin-Vâch, is crossed by a neat bridge. The soil is various, and in some parts extremely fertile; and the surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified. Copper-ore has been found in the parish, and, about eight or nine years since, a mine was opened on a farm belonging to Samuel Church, Esq.: the vein extends to the depth of sixty yards, and the ore, which is supposed to be very rich, in some parts lies within a foot of the surface, but no progress has yet been made in working the mine. In descending the hill from Brecknock to this place, the village and church have a beautifully picturesque appearance, being pleasantly situated on rising ground, and form an interesting feature in the superb view which is obtained from the hill: in front is an extensive common, overlooking a fertile and rich tract of country, bounded by swelling hills, which are cultivated to the very summit; beneath is a pleasingly wooded dingle, through which the river Dulais takes its course: on the left the fine range of the Black Mountains is seen extending for several miles, and on the right is the more magnificent chain of the Brecknockshire Beacons. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4. 12. 1., and in the patronage of the Rev. Charles Griffith: attached to the rectory is a good parsonage-house, with a garden of about half an acre, and forty-seven acres of good glebe land. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a small ancient building with a low tower: part of the ancient rood-loft is remaining, and has been recently converted into a gallery. The register contains entries of marriages celebrated, during the protectorate of Cromwell, before the bailiff of Brecknock; and, during the same period, the births and not the baptisms are registered. There is a place of worship for Anabaptists. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £84. 6.

TALGARTH, a parish, partly in the hundred of TALGARTH, in which it comprises the decayed borough of Talgarth, and the hamlets of Gryne Vawr and Gryne Vâch, each of which separately maintains its own poor, and partly in the hundred of PENCELLY, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (E. N. E.) from Brecknock, containing 1473 inhabitants, of which number, 741 are in the borough. This place derives its name from its situation in front of the chain of lofty hills called the Black Mountains, which are partly included within the limits of the parish. It formerly comprised three inferior lordships marcher, called respectively English Talgarth, Welsh Talgarth, and Dinas: and the village was anciently a borough and market town, and had numerous privileged fairs, which last are all that remain of its former distinctions. The parish is very extensive, comprising, according to a survey made in 1801, which is quoted by Mr. Jones, in his history of Brecknockshire, no less than ninety thousand one hundred and forty-five acres. The surface is mountainous, and the soil extremely various, being in some parts fertile and productive, and in others affording only scanty herbage for sheep and young cattle. The scenery is much varied, but it is characterized more by features of rugged boldness than of picturesque beauty, even in some parts bordering upon the romantic. Though no longer a market-town, nor retaining any of its ancient municipal privileges, Talgarth is, notwithstanding, a large and well-built place, occupying an eminence rising gently from the river Ennig, which is here crossed by a neat stone bridge of one arch, and, after precipitating itself over several successive ledges of rock, falls into the river Llynvi. There were formerly in the parish many ancient seats, the residences of genteel families, which, having in course of time been abandoned by their proprietors, have fallen into neglect, and are now become comparatively insignificant. Among these is Porthaml, noticed by Leland, who derives its name from the hospitality and affluence of the proprietors, the Vaughans, of whom Sir William Vaughan was first high sheriff of Brecknockshire: it is now the property of the Earl of Ashburnham, by the marriage of one of his ancestors with the heiress of that family: part of the embattled wall of the old mansion, and one of the towers, are at present remaining. Tregunter, an ancient seat of the family of Gunter, from whom it derives its name, was originally granted by Bernard Newmarch to Sir Peter Gunter, in reward for his services, and continued in that family for many years: the estate was subsequently purchased by the late Thomas Harris, Esq., who erected the present mansion: it is now the property and residence of Mrs. Madocks, and is a handsome mansion, surrounded by fine grounds, and commanding a pleasing view of the adjacent country, which is richly wooded, of the lofty hill called Mynydd Troed, near Talgarth, and of part of the range of the Black Mountains. Tredustan, a pleasant and commodious mansion, was for many years the seat of Selina, late Countess of Huntingdon, and, after her death, was converted into an academy for young men intended for the ministry among her ladyship's connexion. The Hermitage, the seat of Arthur Macnamara, Esq., is beautifully situated in a retired spot. The village lies within a mile of the turnpike road leading from London to Brecknock through Hay; and the Brecknock and Hay tram-road, in its course through the parish, passes close to it, from which a new turnpike road through Talgarth forest to Crickhowel and Abergavenny has just been completed, diminishing by three miles the distance between Talgarth and those two places. The various bridges in the parish are kept in repair by the inhabitants, with the exception only of Pont y Twr, or "the Tower bridge," over the river Llynvi, in the village, which is repaired by the county: this bridge takes its name from a square tower, forming at present part of a small farm-house, noticed by Leland, who supposes it to have been the ancient borough gaol. Fairs, which are numerously attended by dealers from all parts of the country, and at which great numbers of horses and cattle are sold, are held on February 2nd, March 12th, May 31st, July 10th, September 23rd, November 2nd, and December 3rd.

The living is a vicarage not in charge, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Windsor, to whom, after the dissolution of the priory of St. John at Brecknock, the advowson and tithes, which had previously belonged to that establishment, were granted by Henry VIII. The whole of the great tithes of the borough hamlet, comprising about three hundred acres, commonly called "the Demesne," now belong to the Bishop of Gloucester, and one-third of the small tithes of that division belong to the vicar: the rectorial glebe, consisting of about twenty-seven acres, having formerly belonged to the priory, is still called Tŷ y Prior, or "the Prior's land:" twenty-four acres of glebe, together with a small house just above the village, belong to the vicar. The church, which stands in the higher part of the village, and from all parts of the surrounding country presents a very respectable appearance, is dedicated to St. Gwendeline, or Gwenvrewi, and is a spacious and ancient structure, with a handsome square embattled tower surmounted with turrets: the interior consists of a nave and south aisle, separated by a series of five obtusely pointed arches, springing from octagonal columns, with plain capitals: the windows at the east end are in the later English style. From the churchyard, which is ornamented with numerous yew trees, there is a delightful prospect over a richly cultivated tract of country, embracing a great portion of the counties of Hereford and Radnor. The Independents and Calvinistic Methodists have each two places of worship: one belonging to the former, at Tredustan, has a small endowment, arising from the sum of £170, raised, as is supposed, by subscription, and secured on a bond of the late Lewis Williams, of Pentwyn, in the parish of Gwenddwr, bearing interest  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., and dated January 1st, 1797.

Trevecca House, in the hamlet of Trevecca, in this parish, was built by Howel Harris, the friend and disciple of the Rev. George Whitfield, whose tenets he adopted; and it became the seat of a religious community founded by this gentleman, to whose zeal may be ascribed the prevalence of Calvinistic doctrines among the Protestant dissenters in Wales. He was born at this place in 1714, and entered as a student at St. Mary's Hall, Oxford, in 1735: after continuing there only one term, he quitted the university, and entered immediately on his ministerial functions, as an itinerant preacher. After experiencing considerable persecution, he settled in his native place, where he was highly respected, and laid the foundation of a religious community, similar in some respects to those of the Moravians. For this purpose he built the house of Trevecca, and enclosed a sufficient quantity of garden ground and land, for the accommodation of a large number of inhabitants, whom he invited to invest their property in one common fund, for the equal benefit of all. A considerable portion of the day was spent in religious exercises at the chapel, in which service was performed three times in the day, and, during the intervals, the members were employed in cultivating the land belonging to the institution, the produce of which, after supplying the wants of the society, was sent to market, and the money added to the general fund. A woollen manufacture was also carried on by the members, who thus supplied the adjacent country, and even distant places, with some of the finest flannel made in the principality. The establishment flourished greatly, and at one time consisted of one hundred and fifty efficient members, exclusively of children; but after the death of Mr. Harris, who was both chaplain and treasurer, the number declined considerably, and the establishment is now rapidly hastening to decay. Mr. Harris, a short time prior to his death, settled the house and grounds, together with several leasehold farms, in trust for the use of the community, of whom at present only three of the original members, now more than eighty-eight years of age, survive, and, together with four members admitted after the death of Mr. Harris, two of whom, both advanced in years, are the only surviving trustees, constitute the present establishment. There have been few applications for admission within the last forty years, and it is considered that, should the present members become incapable of labour, the trustees have the power to dispose of the property for their support. The leasehold property has long since fallen in, and there remains at present only the house, with about seven acres of ground. The house is of singular appearance, combining the Grecian, early English, castellated, and Elizabethan styles of architecture; and being much too large for the present number of inmates on the establishment, it is let in tenements to different families: the chapel is opened regularly every alternate Sunday for public worship.

A Sunday school, in which about seventy children are instructed, is supported by subscription. Walter Williams, of Noyadd-Vâch, bequeathed £10, the interest of which he appropriated to the instruction of one poor boy of the parish. Near the church are four almshouses, with a garden to each, erected at the expense of the late John Gunter, Esq., for the use of four poor persons; they have no endowment, and are kept in repair by the parish. Thomas Harris, Esq., of Tregunter, bequeathed a sum of money for clothing ten poor men of the parish yearly. Thomas Bennet, of Pen yr wrlodd, in 1727, bequeathed a house and garden, called Tŷ bâch, in this parish, the rent of which he directed to be distributed among the poor. Mrs. Sybil Williams, of Trêvithel, bequeathed £20 in money, now secured on Capel y fin, in the parish of Llanigon; and Thomas Watkin Probert, Esq., by deed in 1663, gave to the poor of this parish £10 per annum, charged on estates in Tâlgarth and Llangorse. On the Black Mountains there are some imperfect Druidical remains, and vestiges of some military works of ancient British origin. On a farm called Pendre, about half a mile from the village, there is a very perfect earthwork, forming the segment of a circle, and extending for about two hundred yards: it appears to have been thrown up to cover the retreat of the natives to the mountains, or may probably have been an outpost of the fortified station of Dinas, which lies directly in its rear, at the distance of two miles. This last fortress, which was anciently a place of great strength, occupies the summit of a conical hill, commanding the mountain pass to Crickhowel, and the eastern parts of the Vale of Usk: it was formerly a place of great importance, and constituted the head of a lordship marcher, conferring upon its possessor the dignity of a baron of parliament. It is said by most writers to have been built by one of the lords marcher; but Camden is of opinion that it had been previously occupied by the Britons, and identifies it with the fortress of Breccanmere, which was attacked by Ethelfleda, daughter of Alfred the Great, and Countess of Mercia, who, after defeating Hwgan, Prince of Brecknock, here took his wife with thirty of her attendants prisoners, and sent them into England. According to Leland, in whose time it was in ruins, Dinas was destroyed by the inhabitants of this part of the principality, during the reign of Henry IV., to prevent it falling into the hands of Owain Glyndwr. Near this place is a sulphureous spring, called Dinas Well. Thomas Harris, who purchased the estate of Tregunter, and was an elder brother of Howel Harris, above noticed, was a native of this parish: in early life he settled in London, where he realized an ample fortune, with which he retired to his native place. The eldest of the brothers, Joseph Harris, according to a tablet in the church, distinguished himself by his scientific researches; he held a respectable situation in the Mint, and was the author of several astronomical and mathematical treatises, which were highly appreciated. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor in the whole parish amounts to £802.2., of which sum, £761.2. is paid by the borough of Talgarth.

TALIARIS, a chapelry in that part of the parish of LLANDILO-VAWR which is in the lower division of the hundred of PERVETH, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (N. by E.) from Llandilo-Vawr, containing 207 inhabitants. This place is situated near the right bank of the Dulas river, over which here is a bridge, and to the left of the road leading from Llandilo-Vawr to Llanbedr. Taliaris Park, the seat of the late Lord Robert Seymour, occupies an elevated and extensive range of ground, reaching nearly to the banks of the Dulas, and is overspread with a profusion of full-grown timber trees: it was at one time the residence of a branch of the Gwynn family. Besides Taliaris, the chapelry likewise contains several other respectable residences. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the proprietor of the Taliaris estate. The chapel, a neat structure, erected by Lord Robert Seymour, is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £67. 10.

TALLEY, otherwise TAL Y LLYCHAU, a parish, composed of the Lower and Upper divisions, each of which maintains its own poor separately, in the lower division of the hundred of CAYO, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $7\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N.) from Llandilo-Vawr, containing 1058 inhabitants, of which number, 427 are in the Lower, and 631 in the Upper division. This place, of which the name, signifying "the head of the lakes," is derived from two large pools near the church, was originally of much greater importance than at present, and was the seat of one of the most extensive and venerable ecclesiastical establishments in this part of the principality. The parish is situated near the river Cothi, and on the turnpike road from Llandilo-Vawr to Lampeter: it comprises a large tract of good arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and cultivated, and a considerable portion of mountainous common land, affording pasturage to sheep and young cattle. The surrounding country is strikingly diversified, and presents in some points pleasing features of picturesque beauty, and in others a wide display of mountain scenery. Glenyran-nel, the seat of Lewis Price Jones, Esq., is pleasantly situated in the parish, and the grounds are well laid out. Fairs are held on June 22nd and September 20th. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Venerable Thomas Beynon, Archdeacon of Carmarthen, who purchased the tithes of the parish, and the advowson of the living, from the ancient family of Albermarle. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, having fallen into decay, was rebuilt, about the close of the last century, at the expense of the inhabitants, out of the ruins of the ancient abbey, to which the former church belonged, and of which there are still some remains within the churchyard: it is a neat edifice, and contains some monumental inscriptions, among which is a mural tablet to the memory of the father of Sir J. Hamlyn Williams, Bart., the present lord of the manor. There were formerly five chapels of ease within the parish, but of none of them are there at present any remains: memorials of two of them are preserved in the names of two small patches of ground, of which one is called Mynwent Capel Llanvihangel, "the churchyard of St. Michael's chapel," and the other, Mynwent Capel Mair, "the churchyard of St. Mary's chapel." There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A parochial school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children is supported by subscription. An abbey was founded here prior to the year 1197, by Rhys ab Gruffydd, for Premonstratensian canons, and dedicated to the Blessed Virgin and St. John the Baptist; it flourished till the dissolution, at which time it had eight canons, and its revenue was estimated at £153. 1. 4. The remains, having been much diminished by the appropriation of materials for the rebuilding of the church, are now very inconsiderable: they consist of little more than a building which appears to have been a chapel, now converted into a barn, and a high wall, which formed one side of a tower: they are all within the churchyard, and are the property of the impropiator of the tithes. The situation of this religious establishment, in a luxuriant vale embosomed among lofty hills, was peculiarly adapted for devotional retirement and contemplation. From the richness of its endowment, its abbots were little inferior in power to the bishops of the diocese; and to the influence of one of them, who was confessor and secretary to Rhys ab Thomas, has been attributed the active part which that chieftain took in favour of the Earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £299. 6., of which sum, £140. 11. are assessed on the Lower, and £158. 15. on the Upper, division of the parish.

TÀL Y CAVN, a township in the parish of LLANBEDR, hundred of LLÊCHWEDD ISÂV, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES,  $7\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N.) from Llanrwst, containing, with the township of Llanbedr, 318 inhabitants. This isolated spot, though forming part of the parish of Llanbedr, is entirely surrounded by that of Caerhên, and is situated upon the western bank of the river Conway, which is here navigable, and across which there is a public ferry to Eglwys-Bâch, in the county of Denbigh. This is the only ferry between the bridges of Aberconway and Llanrwst, and near the approach to it there is a small artificial mount, on which was once a tower, or castle, erected to defend the pass, but of which building there are not now the slightest vestiges: it is said by Camden to have been called Brÿn-Castell, and to have served as an exploratory tower forming an outpost of the Roman station Conovium.

TÀLYLLÛN (TÀL Y LLÛN), a parochial chapelry in the parish of LLANBEULAN, hundred of LLYVON, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (W. S. W.) from Llangevni. The population is returned with the parish of Llanbeulan. This chapelry is situated in the south-western part of the island, and on the river Fraw, which falls into the small bay of Aberfraw, in the bay of Carnarvon. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llanbeulan, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £800 royal bounty. The chapel, dedicated to St. Mary, is a small neat edifice.

TÀLYLLÛN (TÀL Y LLÛN), a parish in the hundred of ESTIMANER, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (S. by W.) from Dôlgeley, containing 767 inhabitants. This place derives its name from the situation of its church at the head of a beautiful lake, called Llÿn Mwyngil. The parish, which extends eight miles in length and four miles in breadth, includes a large portion of the lofty mountain Cader Idris, and is intersected by the turnpike road from Dôlgeley to Towyn: it comprises about thirty-six thousand acres, of which only about six thousand are under cultivation, the remainder consisting chiefly of barren rugged hills, affording only pasturage to sheep and goats. The soil in the lower grounds, though shallow, is enriched by several small rivers, which descend from the hills in various parts of the parish. The scenery is strikingly romantic, and derives much beauty from the lakes, of which there are two within the limits of the parish; one, called Llÿncae, at the foot of Cader Idris, is about a quarter of a mile long and nearly of equal breadth; and the other, called Mwyngil, which is the principal lake, is more than a mile in length, and something less than half a mile broad. The latter abounds with excellent trout and eels: the vale in which it is situated is so contracted as to leave, for a considerable part of its length, only a very narrow road on each side of the lake, from the clear surface of which are reflected its precipitous declivities. Towards the extremity of the vale the lake contracts gradually into the form of a river, rushing with rapidity through a stone arch into a very narrow pass, having on one side the church, and on the other the small cluster of houses which form the village, embosomed in trees, and assuming a romantically beautiful appearance. At the distance of a mile or two beyond the church, the hills almost meet, and present a sterile and rugged aspect;

they are broken into numberless crags, of which some are vertical and sharply pointed, but the greater number project horizontally, and impend with threatening gloom over the vale beneath. One of these precipices, from its resemblance in form to a harp, has been called Pen y Delyn; and another, from a tradition that it was formerly the practice to throw thieves from its summit, has been denominated Llam y Lladron, or "the thieves' leap." There were formerly some ancient seats in the parish, of which the principal were Aberleven and Maes y pandy; but they have been abandoned by their proprietors, and are now occupied by tenants. Slate is found in the parish, and some quarries are now worked. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £1400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, and beautifully situated within a few yards of the lake, is an ancient building in the early style of English architecture. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A mineral spring, called the Bishop's Well, was formerly much resorted to for its efficacy in the cure of rheumatism. At a place called Llwyn Dôl Ithel was found, in 1684, while digging for turf, a coffin made of deal, seven feet in length, and carved and gilt at both ends: two skeletons were deposited in it, the feet of the one lying by the head of the other: they were of uncommon size, and the bones moist and tough. Within a few yards of the coffin were found two other skeletons of the same size, lying on the clay, and near them a grave in which was a skeleton of the ordinary size; along the grave and coffin were laid hazel rods, with the bark remaining, and perfectly pliable. The high state of preservation in which these relics were found is attributed to the bituminous quality of the turbary in which they were deposited. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £445. 6.

TAVOLOG, a joint township with Brÿn-Uchel, in the parish of CEMMES, hundred of MACHYNLLETH, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES,  $9\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. E. by E.) from Machynlleth. The population is returned with that of Brÿn-Uchel. It is situated on the right bank of the river Tavolog, which falls into the river Dovey near Mallwyd; and it forms the northern portion of the parish, which borders on Merionethshire.

TELBENNY, a parish in the hundred of Rhôs, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (W. S. W.) from Haverfordwest, containing 222 inhabitants. It is situated on the south side of St. Bride's bay, on a ridge overlooking which the village is chiefly built. Goldtop Road, off the coast of this parish, forming the south-westernmost recess of the bay, and affording safe anchorage for vessels during gales from certain quarters, might, according to Mr. Morris' account, in his survey of the Welsh coast, be made a very safe roadstead, in three or four fathoms water, by the construction of a pier on Burrow Head, in the erection of which the beach might be cleared of the large stones which now encumber it. This improvement of the haven, it is thought, would make it a place of great trade, as there are several mines of stone coal in the neighbourhood. At the western extremity of the parish is the small inlet of Mill Haven, and at the eastern that of Little Haven. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £9. 12. 6., and in the patronage of Sir John Owen, Bart. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is situated near the coast, below the village. The average annual expenditure for the relief of the poor is £99. 14.

TELYCH, a hamlet in that part of the parish of LLANDINGAT which is in the higher division of the hundred of PERVETH, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (E. by S.) from Llandovery, containing 270 inhabitants. It comprises a district through part of which flow the rivers Brân and Gwdderig, and exhibits some well-wooded enclosures, occupying the vales and sides of the hills.

TENBY (DYNBYCH Y PYSCOED), a parish, including the In-Liberty and the Out-Liberty (each of which separately maintains its own poor), the former constituting the borough, and comprising the sea-port and market town of Tenby, and having exclusive jurisdiction, though locally in the hundred of Narberth, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 11 miles (E.) from Pembroke, 20 (S. E.) from Haverfordwest, and 245 (W.) from London, containing 2128 inhabitants, of which number, 1942 are within the limits of the borough. This place was at a very remote period occupied by the ancient Britons as a fishing town, for which its situation on the coast rendered it extremely favourable; and from this circumstance it obtained its Welsh name, of the first part of which its present appellation is an obvious modification. According to George Owen, an eminent antiquary of the reign of Elizabeth, whose manuscript history of Pembrokeshire is now in the library of the British Museum, the origin of the present town is attributable to the settlement of the Flemings in this part of the principality by Henry I., who placed them under the protection and control of Gerald de Windsor, governor of Pembroke castle, whom he ordered to provide them with habitations, on condition of their garrisoning the castles which the king then had in Wales, and which were erected by the Normans for the security of the territories which they had usurped by conquest. In order to protect themselves from the repeated attacks of the native Welsh, and to maintain possession of the lands which had been assigned to them, they soon found it necessary to build the towns of Tenby, Pembroke, and Haverfordwest, which they fortified with strong and lofty walls; and from that time Tenby began to assume a high degree of importance as a strongly fortified military post, and progressively to enjoy, from its advantageous situation, considerable prosperity as a maritime and commercial town. In the year 1150, Cadell, eldest son of Rhys ab Gruffydd, Prince of South Wales, being on a hunting excursion in the neighbourhood, was suddenly attacked by a party of the inhabitants of Tenby, who lay in ambush for that purpose, and who, rushing from their concealment, soon put to flight the unarmed retinue by which he was attended: but Cadell resolutely defended himself against the assailants, of whom he killed several, and, though severely wounded in the conflict, ultimately effected his escape. Two years after this event Meredydd and Rhys, brothers of Cadell, in order to avenge this outrage, assembled all their forces, and, advancing to Tenby, scaled the walls of the town, surprised the castle, and put most of the garrison to the sword. During the minority of Isabel, Countess of Pembroke, the several castles in her earldom were entirely neglected, and the castle of Tenby, being unprovided with a sufficient garrison, was attacked by Maelgwyn and Hywel, sons of Rhys ab Gruffydd, who, coming against it with an overwhelming force, destroyed the fortress, burned the town, and put many of the inhabitants to the sword. It was a considerable time before Tenby recovered from the devastation it suffered upon this occasion: the castle was repaired, and its fortifications strengthened, by William Marshall, who, espousing Isabel, was created Earl of Pembroke; but the town remained for a much longer time in ruins. William had five sons, who all succeeded in turn to the palatinate: of these, Walter, the fourth son, gave orders for restoring the town and building a church and an almshouse; but dying before his intentions were carried into effect, Warren de Mountchensy, who married his sister, and succeeded in her right to the earldom, completed the plans of his predecessor, and made to the church a valuable present of plate and jewels.

During the wars of the houses of York and Lancaster, the fortifications were repaired and strengthened by Jasper Earl of Pembroke, who, in the 36th of Henry VI., caused the platform along the summit of the walls to be widened for the greater facility of posting soldiers on the battlements, and the moat by which they were surrounded to be much increased in depth and breadth. Henry Earl of Richmond, and his mother, sought shelter in the castle of this place, to which they were brought by David ab Thomas, one of the brothers of Sir Rhys, a zealous adherent of the House of Lancaster, from Pembroke castle, where they had been besieged. Here they received due attention from the mayor of the town, and embarked for Brittany under the protection of Jasper Earl of Pembroke, and uncle of Henry, who accompanied them to the continent. In the reign of Elizabeth, a memorial was presented by the Bishop of St. David's, and the principal persons of the county, praying that fit persons might be sent to inspect the castle and fortifications of Tenby, preparatory to putting them into a state of defence against the threatened invasion of the Invincible Armada of Spain. The walls were consequently restored by order of the queen, whose initials, with the date 1588, are still visible. At the commencement of the civil war in the reign of Charles I., the castle and the town were garrisoned for the king; but in 1644, Colonel Laugharne, with a strong body of parliamentary forces, laid siege to the place, which was resolutely defended by Colonel Gwyn, the governor, for three days, when a breach being made in the walls, it was taken by storm, and the governor, the high sheriff, and three hundred men were made prisoners. In 1647, the castle and town were seized for the king by the same Colonel Laugharne, who, in conjunction with Colonel Poyer, who had been made governor of Tenby by the parliament, and Colonel Powell, had abandoned the parliamentary cause, and embraced the royal interests; and from the strength of the garrison, composed of three hundred men, with twenty-five pieces of ordnance, and the abundant store of provisions and ammunition with which it was supplied, it proved a formidable obstacle to the entire subjugation of the country to the authority of the parliament. Cromwell, who was soon after despatched into South Wales with an army of eight thousand men, sent a detachment of twelve hundred, under the command of Colonel Read, to besiege this place. For five days it held out against all the efforts of the united forces of Colonel Read and Colonel Constable, by whom the former had been joined, until, the suburbs having been taken by storm, and a breach made in the walls, the garrison was compelled to surrender at discretion, and among the prisoners were numerous gentlemen of the surrounding country.

The town is romantically situated on the eastern and southern sides of a rocky peninsula stretching out into the Bristol channel, and rising to an elevation of one hundred feet above the level of high water: it consists of one principal street, and several smaller ones diverging from it, which latter are, in some instances, inconveniently narrow. The houses are in general well built and of respectable appearance, and several of recent erection command some fine views over the sea. Considerable improvement has been made of late years, among which may be noticed the erection of a new market-house by the corporation, and the formation of a new line of road, by which the approach to the town has been greatly facilitated, by avoiding a steep and dangerous descent from Narberth and the eastern parts of the adjacent country, and which was opened to the public in 1831. The principal street is well paved, but not lighted, and the inhabitants are provided with water from conduits in the town, supplied by pipes from a reservoir, into which it is conveyed from springs in the neighbourhood: these works were constructed at the expense of the corporation, on a plan recommended to their adoption by Sir William Paxton, who, having purchased a considerable portion of land in the borough, caused a survey of the adjacent country to be made, with a view to supply this desirable and important accommodation, from the want of which the inhabitants had previously suffered great inconvenience. The reservoir, however, fails to afford a sufficient supply once in about every ten years, for five or six weeks together, during which time the inhabitants are obliged to supply themselves from a brook at nearly the same distance as the reservoir. The surrounding scenery is romantically beautiful and picturesque: the majestic masses of rock, of various forms and hues, which line the coast; the numerous bays and distant promontories stretching into the sea; the receding coasts of Carmarthenshire, with the projecting headland of Gower, enclosing the great bay of Carmarthen, on the western boundary of which the town is situated; the small islands of Caldey and Lundy, with the distant shores of Somersetshire and Devonshire, combine to impart a high degree of interest, variety, and beauty to the sea view, which is pleasingly enlivened by the frequent passing and repassing of vessels navigating the Bristol channel. On one side of the town there is a drive of eleven miles to the ancient town of Pembroke, through a fine champaign country, studded with churches, villages, and gentlemen's seats surrounded with plantations and pleasure grounds; and on the other the country is agreeably diversified with swelling eminences, clothed with verdure, and small valleys richly wooded. The beautiful situation of the town, the fine beach and firm and smooth sands, the transparency of the sea-water, and the pleasant walks and extensive drives in the vicinity, have rendered it a fashionable place of resort for sea-bathing, and, since the close of the last century, raised it from the decline into which it had for many years previously fallen, to a high rank among the most favourite watering-places on the coast. Many good lodging-houses have been built for the accommodation of visitors, and several respectable private houses are appropriated, during the season, to the reception of families. Baths, provided with every convenience, were erected by Sir William Paxton under the castle hill, and are supplied from a capacious reservoir filled from the sea at every tide: this establishment comprises two spacious pleasure baths, one for gentlemen and one for ladies, four small cold baths, and also warm sea-water and vapour baths, with apparatus for heating them to any degree of temperature required. The same building contains also lodging-rooms for the accommodation of such invalids as may find it inconvenient to be at a distance from the baths, and a general room as a promenade, and for the purpose of taking refreshments. The exterior of the building is neat, but without any pretension to architectural style, and an excellent carriage road has been made to the house, which commands a fine view over the sea, on one side, and, on the other, of the shipping in the bay. A neat small theatre was erected about the year 1810; but dramatic performances not being much encouraged here, it has never been made an architectural ornament to the place. A private reading-room and subscription library are in general well attended, and balls and concerts occasionally take place under the direction of a master of the ceremonies. The sands afford delightful promenades, and abound also with shells of various descriptions, not less than one-half of the British collection of six hundred varieties having been found on this coast, on which many valuable shells, commonly esteemed foreign, have also been found.

Soon after the settlement of the Flemings at this place, the small harbour of Tenby was greatly improved for the convenience of the shipping employed at the port, the trade of which, from that time, progressively increased; and a very considerable part of its population was employed in carrying on the woollen manufacture, which was introduced by these settlers, and continued to flourish here for many years. From what cause the commercial and manufacturing importance of the town first began to decline has not been clearly ascertained, but its manufactures have been discontinued for a great length of time, and the only trade at present consists in exporting to the western and southern coasts of England the coal, culm, and limestone raised in the Out-Liberty of the parish, and which are chiefly shipped from Saunder's Foot, three miles to the north, to which place a tram-road from the different works is now in progress; and in the importation of shop goods from Bristol, between which place and Tenby a regular communication is maintained by means of a steam-packet, which conveys goods and passengers twice in the week during the season. The harbour, which, according to the custom-house regulations, is a creek to the port of Milford, is dry at low water, and is sheltered from the south and west winds by the lofty peninsula on which the town is situated; while on the east it is protected by the castle hill, and on the north by a small but handsome pier of ancient erection, which, stretching north-westward from the castle hill, in an irregular curve, terminates in a kind of circular bastion, the whole forming a remarkably picturesque object: the mouth of the harbour is daily cleared by a body of water retained each tide by flood-gates: the coal is never shipped here except when the weather will not permit vessels to receive it at Saunder's Foot, at which place a pier is now in progress of erection, and is almost completed, which will afford increased facilities for shipping coal and culm. The adjacent bay of Carmarthen abounds with almost every species of fish, and is frequented by vessels from all the neighbouring and opposite coasts, which frequently put into this harbour, as being the nearest place of safety to the fishing stations. The market days are Wednesday and Saturday, and the fish market, which is plentifully supplied with excellent fish, is opened daily. Fairs are held annually on May 4th, Whit-Tuesday, July 1st, October 2nd, and December 4th: that called St. Margaret's fair may, by charter, continue for three days; but since the establishment of the fair at Narberth, in the reign of Charles II., in consequence of the more central situation of that place, the fairs of this town have been on the decline, and are now but very thinly attended. A new market-place, as noticed above, was constructed in the High-street, at the expense of the corporation, in 1829: it is commodiously arranged, and has a handsome façade, with the arms of the borough sculptured in relief, on a shield of white marble, in the tympanum of the pediment above the entrance.

The inhabitants were first incorporated by William de Valence, with the consent of his consort Johanna, by whose right he had succeeded to the palatinate: this nobleman's charter, ordaining that the burgesses should choose annually from among themselves two portreeves, and that they should have free common over all his lands from mowing and reaping times until the Feast of the Purification, is still extant, and was confirmed and enlarged by his son, Aymer de Valence, and by Laurence de Hastings, successive Earls of Pembroke. Under the charter of these noblemen the government of the borough was vested in two equal provosts. Humphrey Duke of Gloucester and Earl of Pembroke extended the privileges of the burgesses; and all the charters granted by the earls, as well as those granted by the reigning sovereigns, were confirmed by their successors from the time of Edward II. to the reign of Elizabeth. Henry IV., by charter granted in the year 1402, first vested the government in a mayor and two bailiffs, to be elected annually. Elizabeth, in the 23rd of her reign, confirmed all preceding charters, and incorporated the inhabitants under the designation of "the mayor, bailiffs, and burgesses of the borough of Tenby," granting them power to elect a second justice of the peace from among the aldermen, who, with the mayor, should hold courts of quarter session, with authority to punish for all felonies, trespasses, and misdemeanours, not affecting life or limb. Charles I., by charter, added a third justice of the peace, and two serjeants at mace, one to be nominated by the mayor, and the other by the bailiffs, whom he made keepers of the common gaol and house of correction, and also charged with the execution of all writs. Under these charters the government of the borough is vested in a mayor (who is also coroner), two bailiffs, two justices, and an indefinite number of common-councilmen and burgesses, assisted by a town-clerk, two serjeants at mace, and other officers. The mayor and bailiffs are annually elected by the existing mayor and the common council, and submitted to the approval of the burgesses in common hall assembled. The justices, who are styled aldermen, and, with the mayor, exercise exclusive magisterial authority within the borough, are elected by the mayor and common-councilmen alone: the common-councilmen are elected by the mayor and a majority of their own body from among the burgesses, and the burgesses are chosen by the mayor and a majority of the common-councilmen. This borough, with Wiston, was, by the 27th of Henry VIII., made contributory to Pembroke, in the return of one parliamentary representative: by the recent act to amend the representation, Milford is added to that district of boroughs, while Tenby retains its ancient right with unaltered limits. The elective franchise has heretofore been vested in the burgesses at large, in number nearly four hundred, of whom about one hundred and thirty are resident; and by such of these latter alone, and of the £10 householders, as are duly registered, will the right of voting now be exercised: the present number of houses within the limits of the borough, of value sufficient to qualify their tenants, is two hundred and twenty-two. Tenby is one of the places at which the poll is appointed to be taken at county elections. The corporation hold quarterly courts of session for the borough, on the Friday after the county sessions are held, in which the mayor and the two justices preside, for the trial of all offenders, of whom the punishment does not affect life or limb; a court of record for the recovery of debts to any amount above the sum of forty shillings, called the monthly court, which is held before the mayor on the first Thursday in every month, and has power to issue process to hold to bail in actions for debt; and a court every fortnight, on Monday, in which the mayor presides, for the recovery of debts under the amount of forty shillings. The jurisdiction of these courts extends over the entire In-Liberty of the parish, constituting the borough, in which neither the county magistrates nor the sheriff have any authority. The borough prison is a neat edifice, consisting of two wards, one called the common gaol, and the other the house of correction, both under the jurisdiction of the bailiffs, and the superintendence of the gaoler, who is appointed by the mayor: it is used only as a place of temporary confinement, prior to the committal of prisoners to the county gaol at Haverfordwest.

The living consists of a consolidated rectory and vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's: the rectory is rated in the king's books at £26. 10. 10., and the vicarage, which is discharged, at £13. 6. 8.: the benefice is in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a venerable and spacious structure, principally in the early style of English architecture, with a square embattled tower surmounted by a lofty spire, one hundred and fifty-two feet in height: being situated in the centre of the town, it forms a prominent feature in the view of it from the sea and the surrounding country. It was erected in the year 1250, by Warren de Mountchensy, Earl of Pembroke, after the destruction of the town by the sons of Rhys ab Gruffydd: the body consists of a nave, north and south aisles, and a chancel, and is richer in sepulchral monuments than any church in South Wales, excepting the cathedrals. Of these, the most remarkable are the monuments of John and Thomas White, brothers, and eminent merchants of this place, which are sumptuously embellished and elaborately sculptured: each has the effigy of the deceased, in the costume of the time, and in each also are four compartments, containing those of other members of the family, of whom was Griffith White, mayor of the borough when Henry Earl of Richmond embarked at this port for the continent, and to whom, after his accession to the throne, that monarch, in recompense for his services, granted a lease of all the crown lands in the vicinity of the town. The western entrance to the church is beneath an arch surmounted with the inscription, in characters of the thirteenth or fourteenth century, "Benedictus Dominus in Domis Suis." The ceiling of the nave is of neatly carved wainscot, and that of the chancel is of wainscot much more richly ornamented. According to Mr. Fenton, three chantry priests were appointed to officiate in this church, one at the altar of Jesus, another at that of St. Anne, and a third at the "Rood of Grace;" for these services lands producing at that time £13. 3. per annum, together with thirteen shillings and fourpence for lamps, were settled on the church. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists; and a building on the pier, said to have been dedicated to St. Julian, and used as an oratory, in Roman Catholic times, by seamen, prior to their setting out on a voyage, is occasionally used by the Dissenters as a marine chapel. A Sunday school is supported by subscription; and it is in contemplation to establish a National school, under the patronage of the principal residents, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children.

A hospital in this town, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalene, was founded at a very early period, but by whom is unknown: about the year 1236, it was endowed by Gilbert Marshall, Earl of Pembroke, with lands for the relief of the lepers therein, and its revenue at the dissolution was valued at £3. 5. Queen Elizabeth, in the 23rd year of her reign, vested them in the corporation, in trust for the benefit of the poor; and in the 43rd of the same reign, by an act of parliament for the better regulation and support of the poor, these estates were transferred from the former trustees to the overseers and churchwardens of the parish of St. Mary, Tenby. The present annual income arising therefrom is about £50 per annum; but, on the expiration of the present leases, which were granted many years ago, the annual income will be much increased. The corporation are trustees for seventeen twenty-seventh parts of a farm bequeathed to the poor of this parish, by Mrs. Bowen, the rents of which she appropriated for distribution, in equal shares, among three aged and decayed housekeepers of this parish, each of whom now receives £5. 13. 4. per annum: this farm was let about sixty years ago, upon a lease for lives, on the falling in of which the property will be greatly increased in value. Two marks, or £1. 6. 8. per annum, are paid to the poor by the proprietor of the estate of St.

Botolph's, in the parish of Steynton; being a bequest made about the year 1633, by Richard Budd, in consideration of his having been saved from shipwreck by taking refuge within Tenby pier. William Risam, in 1633, bequeathed the sums of £50 and £200, to be lent without interest to young tradesmen, which are now lost, having been improvidently lent. Anne Lloyd, in 1619, bequeathed £40, and Thomas Barret, in 1623, left £10, to the poor. Dr. John Jones left in trust to his brother, the Rev. William Jones, certain property, to be applied to such charitable uses as he might think proper; and, in 1703, the latter gentleman appropriated £413, to be vested in the purchase of land, now producing £63. 1. per annum, for apprenticing poor children, and towards the maintenance of such poor persons as cannot support their families by their own labour. Elizabeth Pict, in 1639, bequeathed £10; Thomas Wyat, in 1657, bequeathed £60; and Richard Gethin and nine other benefactors left various small sums, now producing together £6. 12. per annum, to the poor of this parish.

The remains of the ancient castle are very considerable, though mostly in a dilapidated condition: this fortress formerly comprised within its defences the whole of the little rocky peninsula which, projecting eastward from the eastern extremity of the town, forms the southern limit of the small bay of Tenby. The only portions now sufficiently entire to convey any idea of its original strength and importance are, a bastion and a square tower, which are in tolerable preservation, some portions of the walls, and the principal gateway entrance. The state apartments may still be traced among the ruins, and they exhibit the appearance of a splendid baronial residence, rather than the features of a military fortress. On the north of the grand entrance are the ruins of a once stately hall, one hundred feet in length, and twenty feet wide; and near the gateway are the remains of another apartment, eighty feet long and thirty feet wide: attached to this are smaller rooms, which appear to have been offices and barracks for the garrison: a portion of the keep still remains, occupying the most elevated part of the castle hill, and has an appearance of great antiquity. The ancient walls by which the town was surrounded are still in some places entire: the path along their summit, from the northern extremity of the fortifications to the south gate, may be traced; and the pointed arches by which the platform for manning the battlements was supported are still discernible: there yet remain two of the towers by which they were defended, the battlements of which are supported by corbels; and likewise the south gate, surmounted by a low semi-circular bastion of great strength: besides these, some other towers of smaller dimensions, chiefly circular, and a square turret near the eastern extremity, are in tolerable preservation. Several of these towers are richly mantled with ivy, and the whole convey an imposing idea of the ancient strength and importance of this fortress. Numerous specimens of ancient domestic architecture, formerly existing in the town, have been removed within the last few years, for the purpose of widening the streets, and otherwise improving the town; but there are sufficient remaining to give some idea of the style of architecture prevailing in it during its occupation by the Flemings. Several beautiful engravings of remains of ancient military and domestic architecture, now entirely destroyed, are preserved in the "Etchings of Tenby," by C. Norris, Esq., published in 1812. Among the ecclesiastical establishments formerly existing at this place were, an hospital or free chapel, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, founded by William de Valence, which, at the dissolution, had an endowment of £9. 3. 2. for an officiating priest; and a convent founded by John de Swinemor, in 1399, for Carmelite friars, and dedicated to St. Mary. Near the coast to the east of the town are several gentlemen's seats, some of them of very ancient date: among these are, Cilgetty, the residence of the ancient family of Canon; Hên Castle, the seat of Thomas Stokes, Esq.; Merrixtion, belonging to Charles Swan, Esq.; and Bonville Court, the seat of the family of Bonville. To seaward are some insulated rocks of romantic appearance, in which some curious natural caverns have been excavated by the action of the winds and tides: some of these are accessible on foot at low water, and one, off the castle point, called St. Catherine's island, has been completely perforated by the action of the waves, and presents a curious and interesting appearance; and about two miles from the main land is Caldey island, which is described under its own head. Robert Loughor, L.L.D., distinguished by his literary attainments, and by the offices which he filled in the university of Oxford, was a native of this town, in which he died in 1585. Robert Record, M. D., also a native of Tenby, is mentioned by George Owen as having been greatly renowned for his works on cosmography, arithmetic, and geometry: he died in the reign of Queen Mary. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor in the entire parish amounts to £212. 18., of which sum, £193. 8. is assessed on the In-Liberty, and £19. 10. on the Out-Liberty.

THOMAS' (ST.), a hamlet forming that part of the parish of SWANSEA which is in the hundred of LLANGYVELACH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $\frac{1}{2}$  a mile (E.) from Swansea, containing 438 inhabitants. This place, which within the last few years has greatly increased in population and importance, is situated on the left bank, and near the mouth, of the river Tawy, across which there is a ferry to the town of Swansea, on the opposite bank. During the whole of the interval from two hours before till two hours after the time of low water the river is fordable. Within the last few years considerable alterations have been made at this place, under the provisions of an act of parliament for improving the harbour of Swansea. Of these the principal are, the construction of the eastern pier, extending six hundred yards across the mouth of the Tawy, and enclosing a capacious basin, which at high water has a noble appearance; and the formation of Port Tennant, the private property of H. T. Tennant, Esq., by whom it was projected, and at whose sole expense it was completed: it consists of a dock capable of receiving vessels of two hundred tons' burden, communicating with the Swansea and Neath Junction canal, formed by the same gentleman, which extends hence to the village of Cadoxton, about a mile above Neath, where it joins the Neath canal, thus opening a communication between Port Tennant and an extensive district abounding with coal and culm, which are brought down the canal and here shipped. This hamlet includes a portion of the Cremlyn Burrows, an extensive marsh stretching along the coast, and bounded on the south by Swansea bay. It formerly contained a chapel of ease to the mother church of St. Mary in Swansea, but, from the encroachment of the sea on this part of the coast, the site cannot now be distinguished. Dan y graig, the seat of Colonel Cameron, is pleasantly situated within its limits; and it is included within the electoral limits of the borough of Swansea, as extended by the recent act to amend the representation. The average annual expenditure for the relief of the poor amounts to £43. 6.

THOMAS' (ST.), a hamlet in that part of the parish of ST. THOMAS HAVERFORDWEST which is in the hundred of RHÔS, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (S. W.) from Haverfordwest, containing 109 inhabitants. The road to Herbrandston passes through it; and on the west it is bounded by a stream that flows into the Western Cleddy river.

THREAP-WOOD, an extra-parochial district, said to be partly included in the hundred of BROXTON, county of CHESTER, but chiefly in that of MAELOR, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (W. S. W.) from Malpas, containing 477 inhabitants. It is surrounded by the parishes of Malpas, Hanmer, and Worthenbury, and, until of late years, formed a tract of waste common, which, on account of its extra-parochial exemption from all local jurisdiction, was long the resort of abandoned characters of every description, and especially of women of loose or blemished morals, who made a transient abode here, to be freed clandestinely from the consequences of illicit amours. For the purposes of the militia act it was annexed to Worthenbury, and by the mutiny act was connected with Malpas; but the inhabitants, considering themselves beyond the reach of all legal authority, opposed, even with force, the execution of the assize and other laws within their precinct. Some years ago, however, a chapel was erected here, which being endowed, in 1817, with £1800 parliamentary grant, the living is now a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Chester.

TÎR-ESGOB (TÎR YR ESGOB), a joint hamlet with Rhôs-maen, in that part of the parish of LLANDILO-VAWR which is in the lower division of the hundred of PERVETH, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 1 mile (N. by E.) from Llandilo-Vawr, containing, with Rhôs-maen, 636 inhabitants, the population having increased about one-fourth since the census of 1821. It is situated on the right bank of the river Towy, and the road from Llandilo-Vawr to Llangadock passes through it, in a direction parallel with that river. A separate assessment is made for the support of the poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £244. 15.

TÎR-IVAN (TÎR-IEUAN), a township in that part of the parish of YSPITTY-IVAN which is in the hundred of ISALED, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (S. S. W.) from Pentre Voelas, containing 279 inhabitants. It is situated near the source of the river Conway, on the borders of Carnarvonshire and Merionethshire, where the mountains form elevated and extensive wastes, from which descend numerous streams. The name signifies the ground or territory of Ieuan, and is derived from the circumstance of the knights of St. John of Jerusalem having anciently had a Hospitium here. It maintains its own poor conjointly with the township of Trèbrys, the average annual expenditure amounting to £155. 12.

TÍRMYNCH (TÍR Y MYNEICH), a township in the parish of LLANVIHANGEL-GENEU 'R GLYN, upper division of the hundred of GENEU 'R GLYN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, containing 171 inhabitants, who are exclusively employed in agriculture. The poor are maintained by a separate assessment, the average annual expenditure amounting to £51. 17.

TÍR-ROSSER (TÍR RHÔS HÎR), a joint hamlet with Blaenau, in the parish of LLANDEBIE, hundred of ISCENNEN, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES. The population is included in the return for the parish. The name signifies "the long marshy ground," and is descriptive of the situation of this hamlet among the streams which unite to form the Loughor river.

TÍRYMYNACH (TÍR Y MYNEICH), a township in the parish of GUILSFIELD, hundred of POOL, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (E.) from Welshpool. The population is included in the return for the parish. The name signifies "the Monks' Ground," and is derived from the circumstance of the township having at one time formed a part of the possessions of the abbey of Strata Marcella, in the neighbouring parish of Welshpool; a portion of it, amounting to about five hundred acres, is at the present period tithe-free. The surrounding country is well cultivated and productive.

TÍR YR BRENKEN (TÍR Y BRENIN), a joint hamlet with Briskedwin, in the parish of LLANDEILO, hundred of SWANSEA, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (N. N. W.) from Swansea, containing, with Briskedwin, 460 inhabitants. The road from Swansea to Carmarthen passes through this hamlet, in which there are a few respectable residences.

TOWYN (TYWYN - MEIRIONYDD), a market town and parish in the hundred of ESTIMANER, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 16 miles (S. W.) from Dôlgeley, and 221 (W. N. W.) from London, containing 2694 inhabitants. The parish, which comprises a wide tract of about thirty thousand acres, is bounded on the north by the river Dysynni, on the south by the Dovey, on the west by Cardigan bay, and on the east by the parishes of Talyllyn and Pennal. The town is beautifully situated at the distance of about a mile from the sea-coast, near the mouth of the river Dysynni, in a small and pleasant vale, watered by that stream, and on the verge of a tract which once formed a very extensive morass, but which has lately been secured by an embankment from the inundation of the tide. The surrounding scenery, which is strikingly diversified, combines features of romantic grandeur with picturesque beauty: the town is sheltered in the rear by a distant chain of lofty mountains, among which the summits of Cader Idris appear with majestic grandeur; and in front it commands a fine expansive view over the bay of Cardigan. The houses, which are of respectable appearance, are built principally of the coarse grey stone which is found in the neighbourhood; and the general appearance of the place is neat and prepossessing. The fine beach in front of the town, being remarkably convenient for sea-bathing, has made it the resort during the summer of numerous visitors, chiefly from Llanidloes, Newtown, Montgomery, &c. Valetudinarians are also attracted hither by a well, called St. Cadvan's, situated in a field below the church, and much celebrated for the cure of rheumatic, scrofulous, and cutaneous disorders. Formerly it was quite open, but for the better accommodation of the public it has been enclosed, and formed into two baths, each about six feet square, with four dressing-rooms attached: the whole is under the care of a person appointed for the purpose. Several improvements have taken place in the town within the last few years; some new houses have been erected, and a new line of road has been constructed, forming an easier approach: it is in contemplation also to form a road from this place to Barmouth, which would be productive of great advantage to the town. The sands are firm and smooth, and the ride or drive over them to Aberdovey, a rising place about four miles distant, especially at low water, is very pleasant. A beautiful line of road to that interesting village has been constructed under the auspices of Athelstan Corbet, Esq., whose seat is near the town, and is continued from that place to Pennal, affording an extensive ride through a tract of country abounding with picturesque and beautiful scenery, and commanding views of Snowdon, Aran Mowddwy, Cader Idris, and Plinlimmon. Races are held on the marsh below the town, near the mouth of the river Dysynni, on the 6th and 7th of September, and are in general well attended by the gentry of the neighbourhood, and by visitors at the watering-places on this part of the coast. The parish extends eight or nine miles in length, and from five to six in breadth, including, besides the vale of Dysynni, a large tract of land on the banks of the river Dovey, and reaching to within a very short distance of the church of Pennal. The surface is greatly diversified, and the high grounds above Talgarth, Penmaen Dovey, and the town, command fine views of the vales of Dovey, Pennal, and Dysynni, with the surrounding hills and Cardigan bay: the soil is various. Some copper and lead mines, within its limits, have been let by their proprietor, Mr. Corbet, to a company in London, but they are not at present worked. There are slate quarries near the port of Aberdovey, which is described under its appropriate head, and where it is in contemplation to build a chapel of ease, as that place is four miles distant from the parish church. Towyn is one of the places at which the poll is appointed to be taken in the election of the parliamentary representative of the county. Webs and flannels are manufactured in various parts of the parish, affording employment to a portion of the inhabitants. The market is on Friday; and fairs are held annually on March 16th, May 14th, September 17th, and November 18th.

The living consists of a rectory and a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor: the rectory, which is an impropriation annexed to the bishoprick of Lichfield and Coventry, by a forced exchange in the reign of Edward VI., is rated in the king's books at £60. 13. 4.; the vicarage, which is discharged, is rated at £6. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Cadvan, a native of Armorica, who came to Britain, with other religious missionaries, about the commencement of the sixth century, and is said to have been afterwards abbot of Bardsey, is a spacious and ancient cruciform structure, in the Norman style of architecture : it contains some very old monuments, and on the north side of the chancel, under arched canopies, are the effigies of two persons, of whom one, wrapped in a winding sheet, is supposed to be St. Cadvan, and the other, in armour, is said to be that of Gruffydd ab Adda, of Dôlgoch, in this parish. There is also a stone, seven feet and a half long, having sculptured upon it a cross and an inscription on each side, in very ancient characters, and so mutilated as to be illegible : it is called St. Cadvan's Stone, and formerly stood erect against a tomb in the churchyard, said to cover the remains of that saint. In the cemetery was also another upright stone rudely carved, which commemorated some warrior. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Lady Mayor, in 1717, gave £400 three and a half per cent. consols., for the foundation and endowment of a school, which was further endowed, in the same year, by Athelstan Owen, Esq., with £4 per annum : in this school twenty-one children are at present gratuitously instructed. A Sunday school belonging to the church is supported by subscription, and affords instruction to two hundred children ; and there are also Sunday schools in connexion with the several dissenting congregations. Almshouses for five poor widows were founded and endowed with lands now producing £20 per annum, by Mrs. Anne Owen. An ancestor of the Vaughans, of Penmaen Dovey, bequeathed £25 per annum, issuing from a farm and lands in this parish, called Bwlch Llanerchydol and Abergroes, to the resident poor in the immediate vicinity of Penmaen Dovey, the proprietor of which estate was appointed trustee by John Vaughan, Esq., who proved the will of the testator in 1692.

On the contracted summit of an immense rock, rising to a considerable elevation from the vale in which the town is situated, are some remains of an ancient castle of great strength, the fortifications of which comprehended the entire summit of the eminence : one of the apartments, thirty-six feet in diameter, was hewn out of the solid rock. This fortification, which is called Tebeni, Mr. Pennant conjectures to have been the strong castle of Bere, fortified by Davydd ab Gruffydd, which was taken, in 1283, by William de Valence, Earl of Pembroke, a short time prior to the entire subjugation of the principality by Edward I., by which monarch it was committed to the custody of Robert Fitz-Walter, who at the same time obtained the privilege of hunting in the circumjacent country. The Roman road from Cevn Caer, a Roman station in the parish of Pennal, to the village of Carreg, on the opposite bank of the river Dovey, passes through this parish, near Talgarth. Near this place a battle was fought between the Welsh partisans of the house of Lancaster, under the command of Thomas ab Gruffydd ab Nicholas, of Dynevor, and those of the house of York, under Henry ab Gwilym, of Court Henry, one of the Earl of Pembroke's captains, in which the former gained a decisive victory. Here also the same Thomas ab Gruffydd encountered in single combat David Gough, a near kinsman of Matthew Gough, a celebrated warrior in the reigns of Henry V. and VI., whom he slew. A tumulus in the grounds of Talgarth is said to have been raised over the body of Thomas ab Gruffydd, and some of his followers, who were murdered while asleep on the spot, by a party of the adherents of the vanquished. At a small distance from the town is Ynys-ymaengwyn, the seat of A. Corbet, Esq., a noble mansion pleasantly situated in grounds tastefully laid out, comprehending much beautiful scenery, and embellished with flourishing plantations and timber of ancient growth, among which is an evergreen oak, considered to be the finest tree of its kind in the kingdom. The gardens rank among the first in the principality, being very extensive, and containing numerous very curious rare trees and plants. This ancient seat, during the parliamentary war, was burnt to the ground, to prevent its affording any shelter to the parliament's forces ; and on a farm in the immediate vicinity, called Bryn Castell, there is a circular mound of earth, near which, a few years since, the half of a cannon ball, weighing seven lb., was found : this is now in the possession of Mr. Corbet. At Dôlgoch there is a small but very picturesque waterfall. Craig y Deryn, or "the Rock of Birds," about four miles from Towyn, up the vale of Dysynni, derives its name from the number of birds which shelter in its crevices during the night : the scenery around it is extremely wild and romantic, and the discordant clamour which announces their retreat to this sequestered spot adds greatly to the effect of the scene. Its summit was once occupied by an ancient fortress or strong hold, of which there are some vestiges ; and several others of the same kind, occupying similar situations, are found near this part of the coast. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £1466. 9.

TRAIAN-GLÂS, a hamlet in the parish of LLYWEL, hundred of DEVYNOK, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 12 miles (W. N. W.) from Brecknock, containing 703 inhabitants. On the west it is bounded by the Black Mountains on the border of Carmarthenshire, across which the road from Llandovery to Trêcastle passes, and thence descends into a rich vale near the head of the river Usk, which rises not far distant, and flows through the hamlet. There are some agreeable residences in the vale. A separate assessment is made for the maintenance of the poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £359. 3.

TRAIAN-MAWR, a hamlet in the parish of LLYWEL, hundred of DEVYNOK, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 14 miles (N. W. by W.) from Brecknock, containing 634 inhabitants. A separate assessment is made for the maintenance of its poor, the average annual expenditure being £210. 17.

TRALLONG (TRALLWNG), a parish in the hundred of MERTHYR-CYNOG, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 5½ miles (W. by N.) from Brecknock, containing 314 inhabitants. This parish is bounded on the south by the river Usk, and on the east by the small river Brân, which separates it from the adjacent parish of Aberyscir, and is also watered by the little river Cilieni. It is said, at an early period, to have been entirely covered with woods, which were frequented by wild boars. The surface is undulating, and in some parts hilly, and the soil, especially in the lower grounds, is fertile and productive : by far the greater portion of the lands is enclosed and cultivated. The great road from London through Brecknock to Milford passes within half a mile to the south of the parish. Trallong constitutes a prebend in the collegiate church of Brecknock, rated in the king's books at £7. 0. 7., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the lessee of the great tithes under the prebendary: the lease of these tithes is renewable on every expiring life, by payment of a fine of £100. The church, dedicated to St. David, is a plain ancient edifice. There is a place of worship for Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. The Rev. Mr. Williams, of Abercamlais, allows £5, and Penry Williams, Esq., of Penpont, £6, per annum towards the salary of a master, for instructing the children of their labourers; and a room under the belfry of the church is appropriated to the use of the school. On a hill at the eastern extremity of the parish are the remains of a British fortification, called Twyn y gaer, overlooking the river Usk, on the other side of which is another of the same name, crowning the summit of a hill in the parish of Llanspythid, directly opposite to the former, from which it is about a mile and a half distant. The celebrated Owain Iolo Goch is said to have been buried in a field in this parish, which still retains his name. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £208. 4.

TRANE, a hamlet in the parish of LLANTRISSENT, hundred of MISKIN, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES. The population is included in the return for the parish.

TRAWSCOED, a township in the parish of CARNO, lower division of the hundred of LLANIDLOES, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES. The population is included in the return for the parish. The name of this place implies that it was formerly well wooded, but the mountains now afford only herbage for sheep, and the valleys are chiefly under tillage.

TRAWSCOED, a township in the parish of LLANYRE, hundred of RHAADR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (N.) from Builth. The population is included in the return for the parish. It takes its name, which signifies "the cross wood," from having formerly abounded with timber, and is situated between the rivers Wye and Ithon, near where the latter flows into the former. These rivers are crossed by two bridges, that over the Ithon being on the line of road between Builth and Rhaiadr, which passes through the township along the banks of the Wye, and is remarkable for its picturesque views.

TRAWSVYNYDD (TRAWS-VYNYDD), a parish in the hundred of ARDUDWY, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 12 miles (N. by W.) from Dôlgelley, containing 1450 inhabitants. This parish, the village of which is situated on an eminence in an exposed and open mountainous district, on the turnpike road from Tan y bwch to Dôlgelley, is more than ten miles in length and eight in breadth, and more than one-half, consisting of barren hills, is uncultivated, affording only scanty pasturage for sheep and young cattle. The surrounding country is strikingly varied, presenting in some parts the dreary wildness of rugged mountain scenery, in others the softer features of rural beauty, combined with objects of picturesque and romantic grandeur. The lake called Llŷn Rathlyn is a fine sheet of water, noted for a peculiar species of perch, having the lower extremity of the back bone strangely distorted:

the interesting waterfalls of Pistyll Cain and Pistyll Mawddach, in this parish, have been described in the article on DÔLGELLEY. Fairs, which are in general well attended, are held here on April 23rd and September 29th, for horses, cattle, and pedlery; and at Penystyrd, in this parish, others are held on August 17th and September 21st. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £8. 12. 1., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Madryn, is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, with Sunday schools attached to each. David Lloyd, in 1686, bequeathed £20 to the poor; Robert Roberts, in 1756, gave £12 to be distributed in bread; and Mrs. Jones, near Corwen, and her daughter-in-law, bequeathed £180, directing that the interest should be appropriated to the annual distribution of £4, in sums of five shillings each, to sixteen poor women, and the remaining £4. 10. to the apprenticing of a poor boy once in two years. There are some remains of an ancient fortress called Castell Prysor, the name of which implies its hasty erection: it is of small extent, and occupied a situation in a pass between the hills on the left of the road from Trawsvynydd to Bala. The origin of this fortress, which is built of stone without any cement, is not precisely known; but, from the discovery of several urns and coins near the site, it is supposed to have been either built or occupied by the Romans; and part of a Roman road, now called "the Sarn Helen," which is still visible at no great distance, in some degree corroborates this opinion. On a farm in this parish, called Llêch Idris, is Bedd Porus, or "the grave of Porus," over which is a flat stone with the inscription "Porus hic in tumulo jacit, homo — pianus fuit." The word pianus has been thought to have been originally Christianus; but although the letter p has by some been considered an r, it does not appear ever to have been read t, and the interval between it and homo is insufficient for the five preceding letters. Near this spot is an upright stone, called Llêch Idris, from which the farm takes its name, and concerning which there is a legend stating it to have derived that appellation from a giant named Idris; but it appears to be simply one of those monumental stones so frequently found in this country. Near the Sarn Helen are several tumuli, in one of which were found five urns, and several fragments of bricks, which had been placed round them to protect them from injury: there is also a tumulus on a farm called Gwŷnionydd. Humphrey Lloyd, Bishop of Bangor, was born at Bôdyvudda, in this parish, about the year 1600; and Sion and Rhŷs Cain, both eminent bards, were also natives of this parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £552.

TRÊBRY (TRÊV-BRYS), a township in that part of the parish of YSPYTTY IVAN which is in the hundred of ISALED, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, containing 174 inhabitants. This township, which is sometimes called Prees Uchâ, lies near the head of the river Clettwr, on the border of Merionethshire, in a mountainous district, and on the road from Corwen to Llanrwst. It supports its poor in conjunction with Tŷr Ivan, the average annual expenditure of both amounting to £155. 12.

TRÊ-CASTELL, a joint hamlet with Llanlluan, in the parish of LLANARTHNEY, hundred of ISCENNEN, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (E.) from Carmarthen. The population is included in the return for the parish. It is situated on the left bank of the river Towy, and the road from Llandilo-Vawr to Carmarthen passes through it. At Capel Dewi there was anciently a chapel.

TRÊCASTLE, a detached ward of the borough of BRECKNOCK, locally in the parish of Llywel, hundred of DEVYNOK, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 11 miles (W. by N.) from Brecknock. The population is included in the return for the parish. This place derives its name from an ancient castle, which is said to have formerly existed here; but by whom it was erected, or at what time, cannot be clearly ascertained, neither are there at present any vestiges of it, except an artificial mound or tumulus on the northern side of the turnpike road, which is supposed to have been its site. Its origin is involved in great obscurity, nor has it been satisfactorily shewn by what means it became a part of the borough of Brecknock: it is conjectured that, having formed part of the possessions of Idio Wyllt, son-in-law of Bleddyn ab Maenarch, it fell, with the other territories belonging to that family, to Bernard Newmarch, and thus becoming connected with the town of Brecknock, the head of that baron's possessions, it continued to form part of the great lordship of Brecknock, from which it was not even separated when, in the reign of Henry VIII., Brecknock first became shire ground. The present small village of Trêcastle seems to have formed the old town of Lluel or Llywel, under which name it is frequently mentioned in the charter of Brecknock. It is situated on the northern bank of the Usk, on the high road from Brecknock to Llandovery and Milford, and consists of a cluster of several houses, among which is a good inn and posting-house, from which it derives all the little importance it possesses. The principal proprietor has a design to establish a market here, by which it may probably be increased. As forming part of the borough of Brecknock, this place is subject to the jurisdiction of the corporation of that town: the boundary of the ward includes little more than the site of the village, and even excludes a few small houses forming its north-western extremity. Fairs are held on January 17th, April 5th, May 21st, August 14th, November 13th, and December 14th.

TRÊ-CASTLE, a hamlet in that part of the parish of LLANDILO-VAWR which is in the hundred of ISCENNEN, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (S. E.) from Llandilo-Vawr, containing 377 inhabitants. In this hamlet, about two miles and a half to the east of the turnpike road from Llandilo-Vawr to Swansea, stand the picturesque and romantic remains of Carreg Cennen castle, on a perpendicular isolated rock, rising nearly three hundred feet above the river Cennen, which flows at its base. The whole summit is covered by the buildings, which occupy about an acre, and can only be approached on one side, and with some difficulty. The principal entrance is at the north-east angle, where there is an octagonal tower, which is protected by two square towers on the same side, and at the north-west angle there is a round tower. In the interior is a quadrilateral court, measuring thirty yards by twenty-five.

The east end still exhibits the ruins of several apartments, while the south side seems to have been occupied by the offices. But the most singular portion is the well, which is supposed to have supplied the garrison with water: the entrance to it is under a narrow arched way at the northern edge of the cliff, which leads to a gradually descending passage of unequal height and breadth, lighted at intervals by apertures cut outward through the rock: at the distance of about fifty yards is the well, consisting of a basin excavated in the rock, into which the water drips, but it is not capable of containing more than a few gallons. The situation of this castle is peculiarly interesting: though surrounded by lofty hills, the views from it, especially on the right, where the vale of the Towy presents itself, in front that of Llangendeirn, and on the left the vale of Llandeibie, with a part of that of Loughor, are rich and varied. The castle is said to have been erected by Urien, lord of Iscennen, a knight of King Arthur's round table: the chief circumstance in its authentic history is its capture from the English by Rhys Vychan, whose mother had delivered it to them out of dislike to him. Some coins of the Emperor Domitian were found here a few years ago, and an ancient British celt was discovered in the immediate vicinity. The poor are maintained by a separate assessment, the average annual expenditure amounting to £72. 18.

TRÊ-CEVEL (TRÊV-GEVAIL), a township in the parish of TRÊGARON, lower division of the hundred of PENARTH, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $\frac{1}{2}$  a mile (S. W.) from Trêgaron, containing 125 inhabitants, who are wholly employed in agriculture. It is situated on the road to Lampeter, which passes along the right bank of the Teivy, over which there is a bridge at this place.

TRECH-GWINNON, a joint hamlet with Mlawst, in the parish of LLANARTHNEY, hundred of ISCENNEN, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES. The population is included in the return made for the whole parish. It is situated near the head of the Gwendraeth Vâch river.

TRÊ-CLÂS, a joint hamlet with Myddvay, in the parish of LLANARTHNEY, hundred of ISCENNEN, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $7\frac{1}{2}$  miles (E.) from Carmarthen. The population is included in the return for the whole parish. This hamlet is situated on the left bank of the Towy, and contains the parochial church, which stands within a short distance of that river, the views of which from this place are extremely beautiful and picturesque.

TREDDERWEN-VAWR (TREDDERWEN-VÔR), a township in that part of the parish of LLANSANTFRAID YN MECHAN which is in the upper division of the hundred of DEYTHUR, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 9 miles (N. N. E.) from Welshpool, containing 153 inhabitants.

TREFGARN (GREAT), a parish in the hundred of RHÔS, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (N.) from Haverfordwest, containing 112 inhabitants. It is intersected from north to south by the Western Cleddy river, up the valley of which passes the turnpike road from Haverfordwest to Fishguard. The north-western part of it is composed chiefly of the Trefgarn and Leweston mountains, which form an elevated, heathy, and barren tract, unfit for cultivation. The most remarkable natural feature of its surface is that from which it derives its name, signifying "the town of the rock," and which consists of two rocks of striking aspect, rising abruptly to a considerable height above the moor, and presenting the appearance of ruined castles, an idea which seems confirmed to the eye by their being situated so as to command the narrow pass of the mountain through which the Western Cleddy here flows, and which, on the opposite eastern side, presents a fine grove feathering down to the water's edge. The portion of the parish lying to the east of the Cleddy is called Little Trefgarn. Trefgarn Hall, situated a little to the west of the village, is a modern seat, erected in 1824, by the present proprietor, Dr. Evans, and commands a fine and extensive view over the district of Rhôs. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £1. 13. 9., and in the patronage of Dr. Evans, who is proprietor of the whole parish. Some old encampments were formerly traceable here, but their defences have been levelled. The average annual expenditure for the relief of the poor amounts to £35. 10.

TRÊGARON (CARON, or TRÊV-GARON), a market-town and parish (formerly a borough), partly in the hundred of LLAR, but chiefly in the lower and upper divisions of the hundred of PENARTH, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 39 miles (E. by N.) from Cardigan, and 202 (W. by N.) from London, comprising the chapelry of Caron-Uwch-Clawdd, or Strata Florida, and containing 2282 inhabitants. This place is said to derive its name from being the burial-place of Caron, a Welsh king, who, from a low situation in life, raised himself, by his bravery and generous deportment, to the sovereignty, which he held for seven years: after his death, in the year 219, he was canonized, and became the tutelar saint of the church. The town, which is small and indifferently built, presenting only the appearance of a village, is situated on the high road from Lampeter to Rhaiadr, at the south-eastern extremity of the parish, and on the small river Berwyn, within a short distance of its conflux with the Teivy, which runs about half a mile to the west: a new bridge of stone is in progress of erection over the former, at an estimated expense of £120, to be defrayed partly by subscription, and partly from the county rate. In the vicinity are two small lakes, one called Berwyn, about a mile and a half in circumference, which contains abundance of trout, and the other called Maes Llyn, "the Lake of the Field," where tradition reports the town to have once stood: the latter is situated about two miles to the east, is one mile in circumference, and produces trout and eels. Silver and lead ore are stated to exist in small quantities in Cwm y Graig Gôch, but the mines have not been worked for many years. The market is on Tuesday, for the sale of provisions, stockings, flannel, &c.; and one annual fair is held on March 15th, 16th, and 17th, and another on the first Tuesday in May, chiefly for the sale of pedlery, home-spun cloth, hose, horses, pigs, &c. Trêgaron was formerly incorporated, and its burgesses, in common with those of Aberystwith, Atpar, and Lampeter, had the privilege of voting in the election of a parliamentary representative for the county town; but, in consequence of some acts of corruption at an election, it was deprived of that right by a committee of the House of Commons, on the 7th of May, 1730; and the only electoral right now exercised by the inhabitants is that of the freeholders in the election of a county member, for which this town, by the recent act to amend the representation, is constituted a polling-place. It is under the jurisdiction of the county magistrates. A court leet is held twice a year by the lord of the manor, W. E. Powell, Esq.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £8, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's: the prebend of Trêgaron, an impropriation formerly attached to the college of Llandewy-Brevi, is rated at £13. 6. 8. The church, dedicated to St. Caron, is a neat structure, agreeably situated on a rocky elevation in the middle of the town, and consists of a nave, chancel, and an embattled tower sixty feet in height, in the later style of English architecture: the churchyard contains four ancient monumental stones, supposed to have been set up in the sixth century, two of which have inscriptions. There is a place of worship for Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. At the distance of three miles northward from the town there is a large encampment, called Castell Flemys, forming the greater segment of a circle, and defended on three sides by an impassable morass, supposed to have been constructed by a body of the Flemish invaders of South Wales; and there is another, called Castell Sunnyhill, from its proximity to a farm of that name. In this parish also are several sepulchral heaps of stones, denominated carneddau; a curious bank of earth, extending several miles in length, called Cwys Ychain Banawg, or "the furrow of the Bannog oxen," supposed by Dr. Meyrick to be the remains of an ancient British road; and an artificial mound, encompassed by a moat, called Tommen Llanio, but by whom or for what purpose erected is uncertain. Thomas Jones, a Welsh antiquary and poet, who flourished about the commencement of the seventeenth century, was born at a house called Porth Fynnon, a little to the east of Trêgaron: in addition to his literary reputation, he enjoyed, according to tradition, a less enviable distinction, from his practice of plundering his neighbours, being represented, under the name of Twm Sion Catti, as an expert and dexterous robber: he acquired a considerable fortune by marrying the heiress of Ystrad-fin by an ingenious stratagem, and was subsequently appointed sheriff of the county. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £235. 19.

TRÊGAYAN (TRÊV GIÂN, or TRÊV GAIAN), a parish partly in the hundred of MENAI, partly in that of TYNDAETHWY, and partly in that of MALLTRAETH, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (N. N. W.) from Llangevni, containing 179 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Caian, is situated nearly in the centre of the island, and upon the turnpike road from Beaumaris to Llanerchymedd. It comprises a considerable tract of arable and pasture land, which is, with the exception of a small portion, enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The surface is boldly undulated, rising in some parts into abrupt eminences, and has a greater proportion of woodland than is generally found in this part of the principality. Trêgayan Hall, the seat of Rear-Admiral Lloyd, is a handsome mansion, pleasantly seated in the centre of some flourishing plantations, and forming a prominent object in the scenery of the place. The living is annexed to the rectory of Llangenni, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The church is a small but well built edifice, having a fine south door and a handsome east window. The parish register contains an entry recording the death of William ab Howel, in the year 1587, at the advanced age of one hundred and five years: he is said to have been the father of forty-two children, of whom the eldest, at the time of his decease, was eighty-nine, and the youngest eight, years of age. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £75. 11.

TREGIB (TRE-GIB), a hamlet in that part of the parish of LLANDILO-VAWR which is in the upper division of the hundred of ISCENNEN, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 1 mile (S. E.) from Llandilo-Vawr, containing 372 inhabitants. The river Towy runs on the northern side of this hamlet, where it receives the small tributary stream called the Cennen: the road from Llandilo-Vawr to Swansea passes through it, and it is also crossed by an ancient Roman road. It is separately assessed for the maintenance of its poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £100. 9.

TRÊGOED, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES.—See VELINDRE.

TRÊGORN (TRÊ GÂR), a joint hamlet with Kilay, in the parish of LLANDAROG, upper division of the hundred of ISCENNEN, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (E. by S.) from Carmarthen. The population is included in the return for the parish.

TRÊGYNON (TRÊV-GYNON), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of NEWTOWN, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES,  $5\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. by W.) from Newtown, containing 740 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the left of the turnpike road from Newtown to Llanvair, comprises about five thousand acres of arable and pasture land, which is principally in old enclosures, and about thirteen hundred acres of other land, of which the greater part has been allotted, and about five hundred acres enclosed, under an act of parliament obtained in 1794; the remainder being incapable of cultivation, and affording only pastureage for sheep and young cattle. The soil in the lower grounds is rich; and there are some good turbaries in various parts of the parish, affording fuel to the inhabitants. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied, and enriched with wood; and the views from the higher grounds embrace a well-cultivated tract of country. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Charles Hanbury Tracey, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Cynon, is an ancient edifice, in the early style of English architecture, and contains some neat monuments, among which is one of white marble to the memory of the late benevolent Arthur Blayney, Esq., at whose expense the church was new pewed and embellished. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, to each of which is attached a Sunday school, supported by subscription. Four poor persons are nominated from this parish as inmates of the almshouses founded, in 1709, by Arthur Weaver, Esq., in the parish of Bettws. Andrew Blayney, and Joyous Blayney, in 1774, bequeathed money secured on the turnpike trust, producing £1. 10. per annum, which is annually distributed among the poor. The Roman Via Devana passed across this parish, and some remains of it were here visible until of late years. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £317. 5.

TRELÊCH-AR-BETTWS (TRÊV-LLECH-A'R-BETTWS), a parish in the higher division of the hundred of ELVET, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (N. W. by W.) from Carmarthen, containing 1565 inhabitants. This parish comprises a large extent of arable and pasture land, which is enclosed; and a very extensive tract of uncultivated land, consisting chiefly of heath and turbaries, from which latter the inhabitants principally obtain their fuel, and which also afford a supply to the neighbouring parishes. The surface is uneven, and in some parts hilly. The petty sessions for the hundred are held here every month. It formerly constituted a prebend in the college of Llandewy-Brevi, rated in the king's books at £16, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Teilo, and situated within two miles of the turnpike road from Carmarthen to Cardigan, is not distinguished by any architectural details of importance. Capel Bettws is a chapel of ease to the mother church of this parish. There are two places of worship each for Independents and Methodists, and one for Baptists. A school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children was founded in 1804, by Mr. William Davies, formerly of Plâs y parke, in this parish, and afterwards citizen of London, who endowed it with £4563. 15. 5., in the three per cent. consols., directing the dividends to be appropriated to the education, clothing, and apprenticing of children of this parish. Mrs. Elizabeth Lewis, of Blaendewi, in this parish, also bequeathed £100 in money, of the interest of which sum she directed £1 per annum to be paid to the support of a meeting-house in the parish, and the remainder to be distributed among the poor. In this parish there is a remarkable barrow, called Cryg y deirn, or the "King's Barrow," about sixty paces in circumference at the base, and rising with a gradual slope to the height of six yards: on the summit is a cavity, in the centre of which there is a large stone of elliptical shape, three yards in length, five feet broad in the widest part, and about ten or twelve inches in thickness. On searching underneath it was found to cover a kistvaen, about four feet and a half in length, and three feet broad, within and around which were found rude fragments of brick, and some pieces of bone, which latter are supposed to have been brought there by foxes. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £417. 12.

TRÊLLAN (TRÊ-LLAN), a township in the parish of KILKEN, North division of the hundred of COLESHILL, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES,  $5\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. N. W.) from Mold, containing 49 inhabitants.

TRÊLLAN (TRÊ-LLAN), a township in the parish of LLANDEGLAY, hundred of KEVENLEECE, county of

RADNOR, SOUTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (E. by S.) from Penybont, containing 128 inhabitants. The road from New Radnor to Rhaiadr passes through this township, which contains the parish church; and a branch of the Cymaron river flows through it, near the northern base of a lofty and barren mountain which occupies a great portion of the district. The manorial rights of this township and that of Graig are vested in the crown.

TRÊLYDAN, a township in the parish of GUILSFIELD, hundred of POOL, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (N. by E.) from Welshpool, containing 74 inhabitants. It is within the liberties of the borough of Welshpool.

TRÊLYSTAN (TRÊ'-ELYSTAN), a township forming part of the chapelry of Wolston, or Weston-ny-End, in that part of the parish of WORTHEN which is in the lower division of the hundred of CAWRSE, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES,  $3\frac{3}{4}$  miles (S. E.) from Welshpool, containing 106 inhabitants. This township is situated nearly at the southern extremity of the Long Mountain, on the border of Shropshire, and, with the township of Rhôsgôch, forms the entire chapelry of Weston-ny-End, which is attached to the rectory of Worthen, in Shropshire, in which county the principal part of the parish is included. It forms one of several parishes and townships which are incorporated, by an act of parliament, for the support of their poor in the house of industry at Forden, its average annual expenditure for this purpose amounting to £45. 5.

TRÊMADOC, a market-town and small sea-port, in the parish of YNYSYNNHAIARN, hundred of EIVIONYDD, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 20 miles (S. by E.) from Carnarvon. The population is returned with the parish. This place, which is of very recent origin, and a signal instance of the triumph of public-spirited perseverance over accumulated and apparently insurmountable local difficulties, derives its name from its patriotic and enterprising founder, the late William Alexander Madocks, Esq. This gentleman, having projected a plan for regaining from the sea a portion of land on the western side of the wide sandy estuary called the "Traeth Mawr," purchased the estate of Tan yr Allt, in the immediate vicinity, in 1798, and in 1800 succeeded in recovering a tract of nearly two thousand acres of rich land, then forming Penmorva marsh, which now produces excellent crops of wheat, barley, and clover, to which he gave the appropriate name of Glândwr. Encouraged by the success of his first attempt, Mr. Madocks was induced to undertake the more arduous enterprise of reclaiming the whole of the Traeth Mawr, and for this purpose he obtained, in 1808, an act of parliament vesting in him and in his heirs the whole extent of these sands, from Pont Aber Glâslyn, at their head, to the point at Gêst, at their lower extremity. According to the provisions of this act, Mr. Madocks received a grant of two thousand acres in fee, and was to receive one-fifth part of the land recovered from the sea, or secured from injury by the floods, the remainder to go to the freeholders who claimed right of common on the adjoining marshes. Notwithstanding the numerous unforeseen obstacles which threatened to frustrate the undertaking, Mr. Madocks succeeded in constructing across the mouth of the Traeth Mawr, at the eastern extremity of Cardigan bay, an embankment of earth and stones, nearly one mile in length, from north to south, varying from one hundred to four hundred feet in breadth at the base, and diminishing gradually to a breadth of thirty feet at the summit, which is one hundred feet high from the foundation. By means of this embankment, which, having an excellent road along its summit, forms a line of communication between the counties of Carnarvon and Merioneth, a tract of more than two thousand seven hundred acres of land was recovered from the sea, besides a vast extent of adjoining land, which was before overflowed by the tides, but is now, by draining, rendered susceptible of cultivation. This arduous enterprise was completed in 1811, at an expense of more than £100,000; and, including the lands previously recovered, not less than seven thousand acres have been gained, of which six thousand are now cultivated.

The town is situated on a portion of the tract first recovered from the sea, and is built on the sides of a spacious quadrangular area, having in the centre a lofty column, round the pedestal of which there is a flight of twelve steps. The houses are of handsome appearance, and the town promises, when the plan is fully completed, to be a great ornament to this part of the coast. Tan yr Allt, the seat of the late W. A. Madocks, Esq., is a spacious modern mansion of elegant design, situated on an elevated rock overlooking the town: it is surrounded with thriving plantations, and presents, with its entrance lodge of neat and appropriate design, a pleasing and picturesque appearance. Morva Lodge, and Twntir-bwlch, erected also by that gentleman, are handsome villas in the immediate vicinity of the town. With a view to promote the commercial interests of the town which he had founded, Mr. Madocks, in 1821, obtained an act of parliament for improving the navigation of this part of the bay, on which it is situated, under the provisions of which he rendered it accessible to vessels of three hundred tons' burden, which can now lie here in safety, and constructed commodious quays and wharfs for the landing and shipping of goods. The last improvement carried into effect was the erection of Port Madoc, about one mile from the town, where many good houses have been built, and a considerable trade is now carried on. The principal exports are slates, which are brought from the Festiniog quarries, and of which about twelve thousand tons are shipped annually from this place; and copper-ore, which is brought from the neighbouring mines: the chief imports are timber, coal, and lime. A rail-road from the Festiniog quarries, and the mines in the neighbourhood, to this place, has been for some time in contemplation, and a company has been formed under an act recently passed for that purpose. Lead-ore has been discovered at Gêst, near this town; and an excellent road has been constructed by Mr. Madocks from Aberglâslyn, through Trêmadoc, to Nevin on the western coast of Carnarvonshire. Fairs are held here annually on Easter-Monday, March 6th, May 14th, August 20th, September 25th, and November 12th. On the east side of the area a commodious market-house has been erected, above which is a handsome assembly-room. Mr. Madocks also built, at his own expense, a handsome small church, in the later style of English architecture, with a lofty spire, which forms an interesting object as seen from the coast: divine service is regularly performed in the English language, every Sunday, which is a great accommodation to families residing in the neighbourhood, as there is no other church within twenty miles, in which the service is performed in the English language. The road from Trêmadoc to Bethgelart, along the northern side of the Traeth Mawr, passes for some distance under perpendicular cliffs of great height, in which are numerous chasms and fissures. After heavy rains, or long-continued frosts, immense masses are sometimes detached from the impending precipices, and fall with a tremendous crash, bestrewing the way with fragments, sometimes of sufficient magnitude to obstruct the passage. This road commands to great advantage the scenery of the Merionethshire side of the Traeth, and affords a delightful ride to Pont Aber-glâslyn and its vicinity.

TREMAEN (TRE-MAEN), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of TROEDYRAUR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (E. N. E.) from Cardigan, containing 241 inhabitants. This place is supposed to derive its name, signifying "the town of the stone," from the vast rude stone called Llêch yr Ast, and the adjacent kistvaens, situated near the village, though within the limits of Llangoedmore parish, and, together with a large tumulus on a farm in this parish, called Canllevarvaes, supposed to commemorate a decisive battle that took place here between the Welsh and the Flemings, soon after a body of the latter had effected a landing at a place called Mount, about three miles distant, on the sea-shore. The parish is situated on the summit and declivities of a hill, called, from the stone above noticed, Llêch yr Ast, and comprises about nine hundred acres of arable and pasture land, with a small tract of marshy ground: the soil is principally light, except in the lowest part of the parish. The river Arberth runs through the parish, and, after turning four or five grist-mills, falls into the Teivy. The neighbourhood is enlivened with some gentlemen's seats, among which are, Tre Prior, the ancient occasional residence of the prior of Cardigan; and Trêv Wttial Vawr, now the residence of Miss Vaughan. The turn-pike road from Cardigan to Aberystwith passes through the parish, and within a short distance of the church. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1200 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Philip John Miles, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, was, with the exception of the chancel, rebuilt in the year 1810, and is now a long plain edifice, composed only of a nave and chancel. There is a place of worship for Methodists. In this parish there is a ford called Rhÿdwenwynvarch, supposed to have derived that name from the circumstance of the water having been poisoned to destroy the army of an invading enemy. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £81. 12.

TREMERCHION, or DYMEIRCHYON (TRÊ MEIRCHION), a parish in the Rhuddlan division of the hundred of RHUDDLAN, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 3½ miles (E. S. E.) from St. Asaph, containing 646 inhabitants. The village of Tremerschion is delightfully situated on the brow of a hill, under the Clwydian range of mountains, and commands a rich and luxuriant prospect of the sublime features of that unrivalled vale, the mountains forming its western boundary, and the lofty chain of Snowdon. Lead-ore has been found in the parish, but the works are now discontinued. A little below the church stands the mansion of Brÿnbella, formerly called Bâcheagraig, embosomed in woods, and once the property and residence of Seignior and Mrs. Piozzi, formerly Mrs. Thrale, widow of Henry Thrale, Esq., and daughter and heiress of John Salusbury, Esq., to an ancestor of whom, Roger Salusbury, the ancient house and certain tithes in Llëyn were given, as a marriage portion with one of his daughters, by Sir Richard Clough, an eminent merchant in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, by whom it was erected in the year 1567: this ancient edifice enclosed a quadrangular area, and consisted of a curious brick mansion, with three sides composed of different buildings, the former six stories high, including the cupola, and forming from the second floor the figure of a pyramid, having probably been erected from the model of buildings in Flanders: the bricks were of a very superior kind, and are supposed to have been made either in Holland, or by a Dutchman on the spot: this edifice was taken down, and the present house erected, about the end of the last century, by Mrs. Thrale. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £5, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, is a small neat edifice, and contains an organ, which is an unusual appendage to country churches in Wales. Under a finely ornamented arch lies the effigy of Davydd Dû, or "the Black," of Hiraddug, in ecclesiastical robes: he was incumbent of this parish about the middle of the fourteenth century, and is celebrated throughout Wales for his poetry and prophecies; he translated the Psalms of David into Welsh metre, and assisted greatly in regulating the Welsh prosody: beneath the figure is inscribed Hic jacit DAFID AP RODERIC AP MADOG. Here is also a mutilated effigy of Sir Robert Pounderling, once constable of Dyserth castle, represented as a Knight Templar, cross-legged. The church anciently contained a cross (long since demolished), once in great fame for the miracles reputed to have been performed at it, which are described in a poem published about the year 1500, by Gruffydd ab Ivan ab Llewelyn Vychan. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Margaret Vaughan, in 1728, gave land for the instruction of twelve poor children, and the sum of £100, directing that one-sixth part of the interest should be annually distributed among the poor, and the remainder appropriated in apprenticing one poor child: a school-room was built contiguous to the churchyard, about the year 1765. Divers small sums have been given for the benefit of the poor, by grant of Edward Mostyn, by Elizabeth Williams, in 1730, and by Caleb Hughes, in 1740. Sir Richard Clough, the founder of the mansion of Bâcheagraig, was the son of poor parents at Denbigh, and became a chorister in Chester cathedral, whence he was removed to London, and apprenticed to Sir Thomas Gresham, with whom he afterwards became a partner, and is even said to have contributed a few thousand pounds towards founding the Royal Exchange. He resided chiefly at Antwerp, and amassed so much wealth in mercantile pursuits as to render his name proverbial, on the attainment of riches by any person. His descendants are stated to have been deprived of the bulk of his immense estate by virtue of an agreement between him and Sir Thomas Gresham, to the effect that, on the decease of either, the survivor should inherit the whole of his property. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £242. 14.

TRE'RCOED, a township in the parish of DISSERTH, hundred of COLWYN, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. N. E.) from Builth, containing 276 inhabitants. This township is bounded on the north by a stream which falls into the river Ithon, and near which is Maes Madoc, celebrated as the scene of one of the last engagements between Prince Llewelyn ab Gruffydd and the English. On an elevated common are some square fortifications, conjectured to have been British, notwithstanding their form. The poor are maintained by a separate assessment, the average annual expenditure amounting to £185. 6.

TRÊTOWER (TRÊV Y TWR), a chapelry in the parish of LLANVIHANGEL CWM DŴ, hundred of CRICKHOWEL, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (N. by W.) from Crickhowel, containing 318 inhabitants. This place derives its name, signifying "the township of the tower," from its castle, supposed by some to have been originally the residence of one of the native lords of Brycheiniog, but by whom or when it was founded has not been distinctly ascertained. It was probably built by Pycard, a Norman knight, to whom Bernard Newmarch gave the manor, to be held by knight's service, as of the paramount lordship of Blaenllynvi. From the Pycards the manor and castle descended, by marriage, to the Bloets of Raglan Castle, in Monmouthshire, in whose possession it remained till the reign of Richard II., when, by the marriage of Isabel, or Elizabeth, only daughter and heiress of Sir John Bloet, it passed to Sir James Berkeley, second son of Lord Berkeley, of Berkeley Castle, in Gloucestershire. In 1403, Sir James Berkeley was commanded by Henry IV. to fortify his castle of Trêtower against Owain Glyndwr, by whom it was, notwithstanding, partially demolished, and was never afterwards rebuilt. The manor and the remains of the castle were given by Edward IV. to the family of the Herberts, from whom the property descended by inheritance to the Duke of Beaufort, in whose possession there is a sketch of the castle, as it appeared in the reign of Elizabeth. The village is pleasantly situated on the left bank of the river Rhiangoll, which, after flowing through the beautiful vale of Cwm Dŵ, falls into the Usk within a short distance of it, between the lofty mountains near the entrance of the vale, through which the road from Crickhowel to Brecknock is carried. It contains but few houses, and, independently of its situation and the remains of the ancient castle, possesses scarcely any objects of interest. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty: it was formerly endowed with fifty shillings per annum, chargeable on a certain portion of the tithes of the parish, given by Pycard, the Norman, to the priory of St. John the Evangelist at Brecknock, and thence called the priory tithes: these tithes, since the dissolution of the priory, have fallen into lay hands, and the right of presentation to the curacy, which was claimed by the Vaughans, was, in 1786, sold by Sir Charles Vaughan to the Rev. John Jones, whose nephew is the present curate. The chapel is dedicated to St. John the Evangelist, but whether it was founded by the monks of the priory, or, as is more probable, by Pycard, as an appendage to the castle, has not been satisfactorily ascertained: it was rebuilt in 1776, the expense being defrayed by a rate to which the parishioners of Llanvihangel contributed. A round tower, and some ruined walls mantled with ivy, are all that remain of the ancient castle, which was situated in a very low and damp spot, on the bank of the Rhiangoll, to the south-west of the village. Adjoining the castle grounds is the "fair place of Henry Vehan, Esq.," noticed by Leland, which is now only a farm-house. Among the descendants of this ancient family, many of whom represented the county in parliament, and were high sheriffs of it, may be noticed the gallant Sir Roger Vaughan, who, in the agonies of death, was knighted on the field of Agincourt, together with Sir David Gam and others of his brave countrymen, who saved their sovereign's life by the sacrifice of their own; Thomas Vaughan, who, in the reign of Henry VI., was attainted for his attachment to the house of York; Sir Roger Vaughan, who, fighting in the same cause, was killed in the great battle of Danesmoor, near Banbury; and Sir Thomas Vaughan, chamberlain to the young Edward V., who, with the Lords Grey and Rivers, was beheaded at Pontefract by Richard III. The ancient mansion, with the demesne of Trêtower Court, were sold by Charles Vaughan, Esq., about forty-five years ago, to Mr. William Parry, the father of the present proprietor.

TRÊVDRAETH (TRÊV-DRAETH), a parish in the hundred of MALLTRAETH, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (S. W.) from Llangevni, containing 835 inhabitants. This place, the name of which signifies "the town on the sands," is situated between the Malldraeth marsh, by which it is bounded on the south-east, and St. George's channel, on the south-west. It comprises a tract of enclosed and cultivated land, extending more than three miles in length and two miles and a half in breadth, and about one thousand acres of land which, since the enclosure of the marsh in 1818, has been recovered from the sea. On this land a colliery has been opened, which is now being worked with success, and though the coal which has hitherto been raised is inferior in quality to that found in Flintshire and Denbighshire, it has been highly advantageous to the inhabitants of this part of the island, who would otherwise be compelled to derive their supply of fuel from those counties. The strata through which the pits are sunk consist, first of sand, to the depth of five feet; secondly of freestone, to a further depth of sixty-six feet; thirdly of black shale, for a depth of six feet; fourthly of good coal, to the further depth of three feet and a half; fifthly of indurated clunch, for two feet; and lastly of freestone, to an unknown depth. The dip of these strata is reported to be only one yard in ten, towards the east by south. Since the enclosure of the marsh, and the opening of the colliery, the parish has increased in population, and many new buildings have been erected; and its situation on the road from Holyhead to Moel y don ferry affords facility of conveyance for the produce of the colliery, and of intercourse with the neighbouring districts. Fairs are held on May 1st and November 1st. The living is a rectory, with Llangwyvan annexed, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £14. 8. 11½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Beuno, and supposed to have been originally built in the year 616, is a small plain edifice, situated at the extreme border of the parish, and has an east window of modern date and of good design. The parish register, which is quite legible from the year 1550, is the oldest in North Wales, with the exception of that of Gwaenyscor. The rectory-house, called Siamber Wen, and situated about two miles from the church, on the margin of Llŷn Goron, was erected in 1819: it is a spacious and handsome building, surrounded with pleasant grounds, and commanding a view over the most beautiful and picturesque portion of the parish. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A National school was founded here in 1828, by subscription, aided by a grant of £35 from the parent institution, and a suitable building has been erected, in which seventy children of both sexes receive gratuitous instruction: the school is open to children of this parish and that of Llangadwaladr. A small farm in the parish of Newborough was bequeathed, many years ago, to the poor of this parish; but the sea having made great encroachment upon one part of it, and the remainder being partly covered with drifting sands, it produces but a very small income, which is applied to the diminution of the poor's rates. John Pugh Gwilim, in 1633, bequeathed to the poor £46. 13. 4., and Ellen Griffith a small portion of land. Owen Williams left some land, of which the rent is appropriated to the apprenticing of poor children, and there are some other small donations for charitable purposes. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £300. 17.

TRÈVECCA, a hamlet in the parish and hundred of TALGARTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (S. S. W.) from Hay, containing 282 inhabitants. This hamlet is situated on the road from Crickhowel to Hay, at the foot of the Black Mountains, and near the right bank of the river Llynvi: it contains a remarkable religious establishment founded by Mr. Harris, and described in the article on the parish. The railway from Brecknock to Hay passes along the right bank of the Llynvi, near the village.

TRÈVECHAN, a joint township with Rhŷdonen, in that part of the parish of LLANYNYS which is in the hundred of RUTHIN, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES. The population is included in the return for the parish.

TRÈVEGLWYS (TRÈV-EGLWYS), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of LLANIDLOES, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 3½ miles (N.) from Llanidloes, containing 1820 inhabitants. This parish is situated in the pleasant vale of Llanidloes, and is intersected by the small river Taraunon, which flows into the Severn near Caer-Sws. The surrounding scenery is richly varied, and in some parts beautifully picturesque: the village, which is small, and surrounded by sheltering hills, is seen with beautiful effect from the road to Llanidloes, at the distance of a mile from which it is situated. The inhabitants are chiefly employed in agriculture, and in the manufacture of flannel. The living is a discharged vicarage, within the jurisdiction of the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £5. 8. 4., and in the patronage of Lord Mostyn. The church, dedicated, according to some authorities, to St. Luke, but according to others to St. Michael, is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture, and contains some remains of ancient carved oak of elegant design. In the churchyard are some fine yew trees of luxuriant growth. There are places of worship for Baptists and Welsh Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, to each of which a Sunday school is attached. Ursula Evans bequeathed to the poor of this parish a rent-charge of £1, the payment of which has been discontinued for some years, from neglect of the parishioners in enforcing it; Mrs. Pugh gave £10; Richard Baxter bequeathed £100, and Hugh Baxter £50, both which sums have been vested in land producing £8 per annum; and John Swancoat bequeathed land producing £6 per annum, to the poor of the parish, for whose relief there are also some smaller charitable bequests and donations. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is no less than £1530. 2.

TRÈV-HELYG, a township in that part of the parish of CASTLE-CAER-EINTON which is in the upper division of the hundred of CAWRSE, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES. The population is included in the return for the parish. It is a detached township, bounded on the east by the river Severn. The Montgomeryshire canal passes through it in a parallel line with that river, and also the road from Welshpool to Newtown. It is assessed for the support of the poor with the lower division of the parish, and is within the liberties of the borough of Welshpool.

TRÈVILAN (TRÈV-ILAR), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of ILAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (N. by W.) from Lampeter, containing 313 inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated in the Vale of Aëron, and on the high road from Lampeter to Aberystwith. The surrounding country is boldly varied, and the scenery is in some parts picturesque. In the southern part of the parish is the small village of Talsarn, deriving its name from a branch of a Roman road or causeway which terminated here, and which is situated on the bank of the river Aëron. Fairs are held at this village on September 8th and November 7th. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church is dedicated to St. Hilary, from whom the parish is supposed to have derived the name Trêv-llar, said to be its proper appellation. The old church, having fallen into a state of dilapidation, was taken down in 1806, and rebuilt: the present church is a neat edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, but of much smaller dimensions than the original building: the ancient font, a square basin upon a round pillar, has been preserved. A Sunday school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children is supported at the expense of the rector. Near the churchyard is a mound surrounded by a moat, called Castle Trêvilan, supposed to be the site of a fortress of that name, which was begun by Maelgwyn ab Rhŷs, and completed by his son Maelgwyn Vychan, in the year 1233. Here is a strongly impregnated chalybeate spring, which is occasionally resorted to for medicinal purposes. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £82. 13.

TRÊVIRIG (TRÊV-VEIRIG), a township in that part of the parish of LLANBADARN-VAWR which is in the lower division of the hundred of GENEU'R-GLYN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, containing 496 inhabitants. It is situated contiguous to the valley of the Rheidiol. The poor are maintained by a separate assessment, the average annual expenditure being £129. 14.

TRÊVLLÛS, a hamlet in the parish of LLANGAM-MARCH, hundred of BUILTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $9\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W.S.W.) from Builth, containing 491 inhabitants. It forms the upper part of the parish, between the rivers Irvon and Dulas. At a place called Llwyn y Vynwent tradition reports that a chapel of ease anciently stood, but no traces of it can now be discovered. The road from Builth to Llandovery passes through the hamlet, which is hilly, but has some clumps of well-grown timber trees in the valleys. A separate assessment is made for the support of the poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £215. 12.

TRÊVLYN, a township in the parish of TRÊGARON, upper division of the hundred of PENARTH, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (N. by E.) from Trêgaron, containing 162 inhabitants. It is situated near the Teivy, on the left bank of which, between this place and Trêgaron, there is a bog of excellent peat, and higher up is a beautiful lake, about three-quarters of a mile in circuit, called Llŷn y Maes, or "the lake of the field," from which the township takes its name, and which tradition states to cover the original site of the town of Trêgaron. An old Roman road from Loventium to the northern parts of the county passed through this township; and the remains, consisting of a bank of raised earth, are still visible.

TRÊVLYN, a township in the parish of LLANIDLOES, upper division of the hundred of LLANIDLOES, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES. The population is included in the return for the parish.

TRÊVLYS (TRÊV-LYS, or TRÊV-LLÛS), a parish in the hundred of EIVIONYDD, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (S.W. by S.) from Trêmadoc, containing 78 inhabitants. It is situated on the northern shore of Cardigan bay, and is but of small extent. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Criccieth, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a small ancient edifice, without any architectural claim to notice, and is in a very dilapidated state. There are places of worship for Independents and Methodists. Poor children of this parish are eligible to the free school at Criccieth, founded by the Rev. David Ellis. The average annual expenditure for the relief of the poor amounts to £19. 13.

TREVOR-TRAIAN, a chapelry in the parish of LLANGOLLEN, Nanthewdy division of the hundred of CHIRK, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (E.) from Llangollen, on the road to Wrexham. The population, though formerly returned separately, is now included in the return for Llangollen-Traian, with which it jointly forms one of the principal divisions of the parish.

This chapelry comprises the mountainous range to the north of the town and the river Dee, and contains the ruins of Castell Dinas Brân, an historical notice of which is given in the article on LLANGOLLEN. It abounds with limestone, and the navigable feeder of the Ellesmere canal, which extends up to the Dee at Llantysillio, passes within its southern boundary, along the northern bank of that river, joining the main canal at the Pontcysylltau aqueduct. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the proprietor of the neighbouring mansion of Trevor Hall. The chapel is a small plain edifice, built by John Lloyd, Esq., of Trevor Hall, in 1742, for the use of his family, but not consecrated until 1772. This chapelry shares with Llangollen-Traian in the produce of several small bequests for the instruction of poor children, and for the relief of its poorer inhabitants. The remains of Castell Dinas Brân, situated on the summit of a conical isolated hill, rising to a considerable height out of the vale, and very steep, extend about one hundred and ninety feet in length, and one hundred and fifty in breadth, having on one side a deep trench cut in the solid rock. To the north of them is Craig-Eglwyseg, exhibiting for the distance of half a mile a vast assemblage of rocks composed of different tiers, like an immense flight of steps. Near Trevor Hall is a very interesting natural cavern, extending into a limestone rock to an unknown depth, adorned by a great variety of very beautiful specimens of stalactite, and in which have been found fossil remains of the hyena and other animals of the antediluvian world. This division of the parish is assessed with that of Llangollen-Traian for the joint maintenance of their poor, the average annual expenditure for which purpose amounts to £586. 8.

TRÊVREYAN (TRÊV-RHEWIN), a joint hamlet with Myhatham, or Mallaen, in the parish of LLANARTHNEY, upper division of the hundred of ISCENNEN, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES. The population is included in the return for the parish.

TRÊVRIW (TRÊV-RIW), a parish in the Uchgorvai division of the hundred of NANTCONWAY, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, on the road from Aberconway to Llanrwst, 2 miles (N.N.W.) from Llanrwst, containing 413 inhabitants. The village is situated on the western bank of the river Conway, up which the tide flows to it, and vessels of sixty tons' burden come up to this place, bringing coal, lime, and other heavy goods for Llanrwst and the neighbouring parishes, and conveying downwards the produce of the slate quarries of Trêvriw and Llanrhychwyn. Lead-ore and zinc exist in the parish, and have lately been procured to a considerable extent. Fairs are held on May 12th, September 3rd, and November 7th. The living is a discharged rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Llanrhychwyn annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £7. 15. 10., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a small edifice, consisting of a nave, chancel, and north aisle: it is stated to have been built by Prince Llewelyn the Great, about the year 1230, "for the ease of his princess, who before was obliged to go on foot to Llanrhychwyn, a long walk among the mountains."

There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. A free school, for the benefit of poor children of Trêvriw and the adjoining parishes, was founded here, in 1817, by Lord Willoughby de Eresby, by whom it is also supported. Llewelyn ab Iorwerth is stated to have had a palace here, situated in a place now called Gardd y Neuadd, where some hewn stones were discovered, which have since been used in building a wall, and are pointed out as the only remaining fragments of the royal habitation. Dr. Thomas Williams, a physician, who compiled a Latin and Welsh Dictionary, and wrote some other works, which are preserved in manuscript, was, according to Mr. Owen, a native of Trêvriw, where he died about the year 1620. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £75. 8.

TRÊVWALCHMAI, or TREWALCHMAI (TRÊV-WALCHMAI), a parish, partly in the hundred of LLYVON, and partly in that of MALLTRAETH, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (W.) from Llangenvi, containing 719 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the new line of the great road from London to Holyhead, and comprises a moderate extent of arable and pasture land, which is enclosed, and a small portion of common, affording good pasturage for sheep. The village, which, since the diversion of the Holyhead road in this direction, has considerably increased in size, and improved in appearance, is neatly built, and, though still small, has, with its church, which is situated on an eminence, a pleasing appearance. The living is annexed to the rectory of Hêneglws, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Mordeyrn, is a small ancient edifice, consisting of a nave, with a north aisle or chapel, extending nearly the whole length of the building, and has an east window of good design. William Bold, in 1688, the Rev. Hugh Hughes, and an unknown benefactor, severally bequeathed portions of land for the benefit of the poor of this parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £165. 19.

TRÊV Y COED, a hamlet forming that part of the parish of LAMPETER which is in the upper division of the hundred of TROEDYRAUR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (W. by S.) from Lampeter, containing 120 inhabitants. This hamlet forms a detached portion of the hundred of Troedyrour, and is situated nearly in the centre of that of Moythen. It lies on the road from Lampeter to Cardigan, and extends to the river Teivy. Neuadd, the neat residence of Thomas Jones, Esq., standing on a well wooded eminence, north of the turnpike road, forms a conspicuous and pleasing object in the approach to Lampeter. Here was formerly a chapel of ease to the mother church, but it has long since been demolished. This hamlet is assessed for the support of the poor with Lampeter, though in a different hundred.

TRÊVYDD-BYCHAIN, a joint township with Llewesog, in the parish of LLANRHAIADR IN KINMERCH, hundred of ISALED, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES. The population is included in the return for the parish.

TREWERN (TRÊ-WERN), a township in the parish of BUTTINGTON, within the liberties of the borough of WELSHPOOL, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (N. E. by E.) from Welshpool, containing 353 inhabitants. It is situated on the right bank of the river Severn, and on the road from Shrewsbury to Welshpool. A small stream, designated by the same name as the township, here falls into the Severn. Trevern is separately assessed for the maintenance of its poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £106. 11.

TREWERN (TRE-WERN), a joint township with Gwiller, in that part of the parish of LLANVIHANGEL-NANT-MELAN which is within the liberties of the borough of NEW RADNOR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (W.) from New Radnor, containing, with Gwiller, 126 inhabitants. It forms the extreme western division of the parish, occupying the southern declivity of a lofty mountain which anciently composed a part of the forest of New Radnor. Trevern stands on the upper portion of the eminence, and Gwiller on the lower, with the road from New Radnor to Rhaiadr passing between them. There are two large tumuli on the hill.

TREWYLAN, a township in that part of the parish of LLANSANTFRAID YN MECHAN which is in the upper division of the hundred of DEYTHUR, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (E.) from Llanvyllin, containing 99 inhabitants. It is situated on the south bank of the river Vyrnwy. There is an ancient British fortification in this township, situated in a low meadow, which must have been surrounded on all sides by a morass; it is seen very distinctly from the Meivod road, about a quarter of a mile from Pont y pentre.

TROEDYRAUR (TROED-YR-AUR), a parish composed of the Upper and Lower divisions, in the upper division of the hundred of TROEDYRAUR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (N. N. E.) from Newcastle-Emlyn, containing 1064 inhabitants, of which number, 603 are in the Upper, and 461 in the Lower, division. The ancient name of this place was Llanvihangel Trêv-Deyrn, and was derived from the dedication of its church to St. Michael, and from its having been the residence of some royal personage, perhaps a prince of Ceredigion. Its present name of Troedyrour, signifying "the foot of gold," originated in an opinion that gold was formerly procured at the foot of the eminence on which the church is situated. The parish is intersected by the direct road from Lampeter to Cardigan, and comprises a very considerable tract of arable and pasture land, of which, with the exception of a comparatively small portion, the whole is enclosed. The surrounding scenery, though not distinguished by any peculiarity of features, is pleasingly enlivened with the grounds and plantations of some gentlemen's seats in the vicinity. Troedyrour House, the family seat of the Rev. Thomas Bowen, the present incumbent, who has distinguished himself as an enlightened and successful agriculturist, is a handsome and spacious mansion, beautifully situated. Alderbrook Hall, the seat of John Lloyd Williams, Esq., by whom it was erected, is a handsome mansion, situated on an eminence above the church, commanding some good views, and is surrounded with thriving and extensive plantations, which are highly ornamental to the neighbourhood. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £13, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a neat modern structure, erected in the year 1795, by subscription among the parishioners, under the superintendence of the rector, who has recently added to it a very neat porch at his own expense. Here was formerly an ancient chapel, called Capel Twr Gwynn, upon the site of which a neat parsonage-house has been built by the present rector. There are two places of worship for Calvinistic Methodists, and one for Presbyterians. A school-house has been built at the expense of the parishioners, containing two rooms, in which about forty boys are gratuitously instructed, at the expense of the rector. A tumulus in this parish, called Crûg Mawr, was opened in the year 1829, under the direction of the Rev. Thomas Bowen, upon whose estate it is situated, and was found to contain two earthen vases, and two lachrymatories: one of the vases, soon after its exposure, crumbled to pieces; the other, together with the lachrymatories, was presented to the museum at Oxford. This tumulus was situated on one side of a causeway, supposed to be part of a Roman road. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £289. 3.

TROWSGOED, a hamlet in the parish of LLANDE-VALLEY, hundred of TALGARTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $5\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N.E. by N.) from Brecknock.
The population is included in the return for the parish.
This hamlet is situated in the western portion of the parish, and in a vale through which flows a stream that falls into the river Llynvi. It is separately assessed for the support of its poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £29. 14.

TRYDDIN (TREUDDYN), a parochial chapelry, in the parish and hundred of MOLD, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (S.) from Mold, containing 829 inhabitants, the population having increased one-fourth since the census of 1821. This place, which is situated among lofty hills in a rich mineral district, in the southeastern part of the county, abounds with coal and iron-stone of superior quality; and within the last few years some very extensive works have been established here, which are carried on with very great success. The Coed Talon collieries and iron-works were first erected in 1817, when the proprietors opened some mines of coal, which, being found of good quality and in great abundance, induced them to erect furnaces, in 1821, for the manufacture of iron. These works, after being conducted with profit for some time, were, in 1825, sold to the Welsh Iron Company, who erected additional furnaces, and greatly extended the mines and every department of the establishment, and in 1830 sold them, under the provisions of an act of parliament, to Edward Oakley, Esq., the present proprietor. The principal produce of the works is pig iron of a peculiar quality, which is in great demand, and is much used in making lighter articles of machinery; and the whole of the iron manufactured here is purchased by the manufacturers of machinery at Liverpool and Manchester.
About four hundred and fifty men are constantly employed in the collieries and other works at this place. In the coal and iron-stone shale numerous marine and vegetable impressions are found, and in some instances fossilized bones and shells. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £400

parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Mold. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a neat small edifice in good repair. A school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children is supported by a small endowment, and by subscription. Some small donations, producing about £2 per annum, have been made for the benefit of the poor. Offa's Dyke, which commences on the bank of the Wye in Herefordshire, after passing through that county and those of Radnor, Montgomery, Salop, and Denbigh, appears to terminate very abruptly on a farm called Cae Dwn, about one mile from the chapel of this place. But there is every probability that Offa completed this great work by continuing it to the sea near the Point of Air, in the parish of Llanasaph, as there are several remains of an earthwork in the line between that place and Tryddin, still retaining the appellation of Clawdd Offa, especially near the race-course between Holywell and Caerwys, where it has been partially levelled only within these few years, and also below the stables, and to the north of the grand stand. The poor are maintained by a separate assessment, the average annual expenditure amounting to £309. 2.

TWINNEL'S (ST.), a parish in the hundred of CASTLEMARTIN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,
4 miles (S. S. W.) from Pembroke, containing 274 inhabitants. This parish, the village of which is pleasantly situated on an eminence in the southern part of the county, comprises a considerable portion of enclosed and cultivated land, and a small tract of open downs, affording good pasturage for sheep and young cattle.
Limestone is found in it, and some quarries have been opened, in the working of which a portion of the inhabitants are employed. The village is neatly built and of prepossessing appearance. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £3. 17. 11., and in the patronage of the Sub-chanter and Minor Chapter of St.
David's. The church, dedicated to St. Deiniol, is an ancient building, with a very lofty tower, and, from its elevated situation, is an interesting and conspicuous object from all parts of the surrounding country. There is a place of worship for Welsh Calvinistic Methodists.
Poor children of this parish are eligible for gratuitous instruction in the schools founded by Lady Cawdor, in the adjoining parishes of Warren and Stackpool Elidur.
The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £133. 2.

TÛBRITH UCHÂV, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES.—See GARTHGARMON.

TÛBROUGHTON, a township in the parish of HAN-MER, hundred of MAELOR, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES,  $8\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N.E.) from Ellesmere, containing 218 inhabitants. It is separately assessed for the support of its poor, the average annual expenditure being £107. 14.

TYDWEILIOG (TUDWEILIOG), a parish, partly in the hundred of COMMITMAEN, but chiefly in that of DINLLAEN, in the Llein division of the county of CAR-NARVON, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (W.) from Pwllheli, containing 447 inhabitants. This parish, which is but of small extent, is situated on the coast of St. George's channel, by which it is bounded on the south: the inhabitants carry on a considerable herring fishery. The lands are enclosed and cultivated; the soil is in general fertile, and, except during the fishing season, the population is wholly employed in agriculture. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Sir J. S. Piozzi Salusbury, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Cwyvan, or, according to some, to St. Gwynen. William Jones bequeathed £10, and Thomas John Morris gave a small donation, to the poor of this parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £148. 16.

TYR YR ABAD, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES. — See NEWCHURCH.

TYTHEGSTON (LLAN-DUDWG), a parish, comprising the Upper and Lower divisions, each of which separately maintains its own poor, in the hundred of NEWCASTLE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W.) from Bridgend, and containing 404 inhabitants, of which number, 302 are in the Upper, and 102 in the Lower, division. The present name of this place is only a modification of its ancient Welsh name Llan Dudwg, signifying "Dudwg's town," and originally derived from the dedication of its church to St. Dudwg, or Tudwg, one of the disciples of Cenydd, who flourished about the middle of the sixth century. The parish is but of small extent, but contains some good arable and pasture land: the upper division abounds with iron-ore, coal, and clay for making bricks, of which considerable quantities are procured, and, by means of a rail-road communicating with the little harbour of Porthcawl, are shipped off to the neighbouring coasts. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Newcastle, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf. The church is a small ancient edifice, not distinguished by any architectural details. A school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children has been established in the Lower hamlet, and is supported by subscription. Catherine Lougher, and Thomas Leyson, in 1730, bequeathed each a small portion of land to the poor of the parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of the whole parish amounts to £130. 19., of which sum, £76. 2. is assessed on the Higher, and £54. 17. on the Lower, division.

U.

UPPINGTON, a township in that part of the parish of ABBERBURY which is in the lower division of the hundred of CAWRSE, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, containing 132 inhabitants. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £64. 9.

UPTON, a parish in the hundred of NARBERTH, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. E.) from Pembroke, containing 6 inhabitants. This parish, which is exceedingly small, and inhabited only by one gentleman's family, who is proprietor of the whole, occupies an elevated site above a creek of Milford Haven. It was formerly distinguished for its ancient castle, which, if not originally built, was anciently occupied, by the family of Maliphant, from whom it passed by marriage to that of Bowen. The castle and its dependencies were subsequently purchased by Mr. Tasker, who devised his estates among his three nieces, one of whom, by marriage, conveyed the castle and a portion of this property to the Rev. William Evans, who is now the owner of the parish. The remains of the ancient castle have been incorporated in the buildings of the present mansion: they consist principally of the entrance gateway, and the two circular bastions by which it was defended; one of these now forms a projecting window in one of the apartments. The present seat occupies a charming situation, and commands beautiful and picturesque views of the surrounding country, and of the ruins of Carew castle, washed at their base by the converging æstuaries which unite to form this branch of the haven. The living is annexed to the rectory of Nash, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's. The church is a small and very ancient edifice, supposed to have been built at the same time as the castle, to which it was formerly attached: it contains some ancient monuments, among which is one having a recumbent effigy of a warrior in complete armour, under a richly sculptured canopy of stone: a clenched hand, issuing from the wall, forms a candelabrum for a taper, for the maintenance of which some fund has been probably left by the deceased or his relatives. There are also several mural monuments to the more recent proprietors of the estate. The average annual expenditure for the relief of the poor, during the few years preceding 1829, amounted to £18. 10.

UWCH-AVON, a division in the parish of GWYDD-ELWERN, hundred of EDEYRNION, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, comprising the united townships of Bôdheulog, Cynwyd Vawr, Cynwyd Vechan, and Persaithydd, and containing 755 inhabitants. The village of Cynwyd is situated on the road from Corwen to Bala and Dinasmowddwy, 2 miles (S. W.) from Corwen. It is noted as the place where a court for the thirteen baronies contained within the comot of Edeyrnion was anciently held, chiefly for the purpose of settling the boundaries of the lords' claims upon the wastes and commons, and for taking cognizance of encroachments; but a disagreement arising among the lords, the records were destroyed, and the court has since been discontinued. The river Trusion runs through this village, about half a mile above which it pours its waters over a precipitous ledge of rocks, upwards of sixty feet high, and forms a pleasing cascade: the first fall rushes through a narrow chasm, about forty feet in perpendicular height, and is received into a basin, measuring at least ten feet in diameter, whence it pursues its course for several yards along a rocky ridge, and then rolls over, in three falls of about twenty feet, into a natural reservoir more capacious than the former: within a short distance of this, after passing through the dingle and the village, it empties itself into the Dee. There are two flannel manufactories and a corn-mill upon this stream: the latter, situated near the bottom of the waterfall, contributes materially to the picturesque character of the scenery, which, from the rocky declivities being in many places well clothed with wood, is pleasing and attractive. Fairs are held on August 6th and October 21st. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, with a Sunday school attached to each. A school-room was built at Cynwyd by subscription, in consequence of a bequest of £200 by Hugh Roberts, in 1807, the produce to be applied to the instruction of children of the Uwch-Avon division, and the parish of Llangar, two-thirds to the former, and one-third to the latter. Near Tŷn y Wern there is a remarkably fine oak, about ninety feet high, the trunk of which, at the distance of seven feet from the ground, measures twenty feet in girth, and one of its branches thirteen: there is also in the vicinity a very large elm tree, eleven feet in circumference.

UWCH-COED, a township in the parish of PENE-GOES, hundred of MACHYNLLETH, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (E. by S.) from Machynlleth, containing 446 inhabitants. It forms the upper part of the parish, where the mountains are lofty, and consist of extensive wastes. In those of Dylivau and Esgair Galed lead-ore is obtained, and the mines formerly afforded employment to many families, but are at present only partially worked. The road from Newtown to Machynlleth passes through it.

UWCH-MYNYDD, a division in the parish of GWYDELWERN, hundred of EDEYRNION, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, comprising the united townships of Bôdgynvan and Clegir, and containing, with the division of Cwm, 822 inhabitants. The small romantic village of Melinwig is situated within its limits. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, with Sunday schools attached. Vestiges of a British encampment are traceable on Bettws mountain.

UWCH Y GARREG (UWCH-GAREG), a township in the parish of MACHYNLLETH, lower division of the hundred of MACHYNLLETH, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (S. E.) from Machynlleth, containing 332 inhabitants. It comprises the upper portion of the parish, which consists principally of boggy elevations and barren wastes. Moel Vadyn is a conical eminence rising one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four feet above the level of the sea. The lofty Plinlimmon bounds this township on the south-west, and at its base is a pool called Glâslyn, or "the Blue Lake." Nearly half-way to Llanidloes, and about a mile and a half from the road, there is a very picturesque waterfall, called Pistyll Rhaiadr, formed by a stream which here precipitates itself with great force over several rocky ledges, one of which is perpendicular and of considerable height. The road from Machynlleth to Llanidloes passes through the township, and a short distance to the right of it, not far from Glâslyn, are some lead mines, which have been only partially worked, though the ore is said to contain some silver. A separate assessment is made for the support of the poor, the average annual expenditure being £266.13.

UWCH Y GRAIG (UWCH-GRAIG), a township in the parish of LLANDDYWYWAU, hundred of ARDUDWY, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES. The population is included in the return for the parish, of which it forms the upper part, and consists chiefly of lofty and extensive mountains. The road from Dôlgeley to Harlech passes through it, and it contains three small lakes, called respectively Llŷn Irdin, Llŷn Bodlyn, and Llŷn Dulyn, of which the two latter are connected; and from these issues a stream which falls into Cardigan bay. Near them, in the plain adjacent, are various Druidical remains, consisting of cromlechs, carneddau, maen hirion, and kistvaens; and on the west there is a British post, named Craig y Dinas, surrounded with rough stones, on the summit of a conical hill. In an opposite direction, on the top of another hill, is Castell Dinas Cortin, encircled with intrenchments, and having an advanced work in front. Towards the northern part of the township there is a narrow defile, named Drws Ardudwy, or "the Door into Ardudwy," through which a difficult and dangerous road, under impending cliffs, leads from Trawsvynydd to the parish church.

UZMASTON, a parish in the hundred of DUNGLEDY, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (S. E.) from Haverfordwest, containing 525 inhabitants. This parish, commonly called "Ismiston," is situated on the Western Cleddy river, and comprises a moderate extent of enclosed and cultivated land: the soil is generally fertile, and the inhabitants are chiefly employed in agriculture. The western part of it, containing the straggling extremity of a suburb of Haverfordwest, called Cartlett, is included within the new electoral limits of that borough. The parish rates are levied by the ploughland, in the measurement of which ten feet and a half are allowed to each rod. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Precentor and Chapter of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Ismael, is not remarkable for any architectural details. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £229.4.

V.

VAINOR, or VAYNOR (Y VAENOR, or MAENOR), a parish in the hundred of PENCELLE, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. by E.) from Merthyr-Tydvil, containing 1933 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises the hamlets of Coedycymmer, Dyfryn, and Gelli, in which last is the church, is situated on the Lesser Taf river, about two miles to the left of the turnpike road from Brecknock to Merthyr-Tydvil. It comprises an extensive tract of land, of which a very considerable portion is unenclosed and uncultivated: the remainder produces very good crops of grain, and excellent pasturage for sheep and cattle. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, and the adjacent country abounds with interesting objects: the views over the counties of Brecknock, Monmouth, and Glamorgan, are extensive and picturesque. Limestone is found in various parts of the parish, and the procuring of it affords employment to a portion of the inhabitants, of whom the remainder are engaged in agriculture, and in the works at Merthyr-Tydvil. For the accommodation of the persons employed in the iron-works of that place the village of Coedycymmer, in this parish, appears to have arisen: it is built upon a tract of common, without any regard to regularity or order, and is almost exclusively inhabited by persons employed in these works, since the establishment of which the parish has greatly increased in population. Some lead-ore has been occasionally discovered above Coedycymmer, near the turnpike road, but not in sufficient quantity to remunerate the labours of the miner. A small woollen manufacture has also been carried on in the parish for some years; but the number of persons employed in it is very inconsiderable. This parish is within the jurisdiction of the court of requests held at Merthyr-Tydvil, on the second Thursday in every month, pursuant to an act passed in 1809, for the recovery of debts not exceeding £5. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £8. 3. 11½, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The advowson of the living, prior to the Reformation, was vested in the lords of Brecknock, but was forfeited on the attainder of the Duke of Buckingham, in the reign of Henry VIII., since which time it has remained with the principedom. The church, dedicated, according to some authorities, to St. Gwendoline, and to others to St. Gwenvrewi, is an ancient edifice, consisting of a nave, chancel, and small tower: it is pleasantly situated on the western bank of the Lesser Tâf, upon a shelving ledge of ground, which appears to have subsided from the adjoining hill, or to have been torn from it by some violent convulsion: it is a dark, low building, not possessing any architectural claim to notice. In the outside wall there is a stone commemorating the decease of a woman who lived during seven successive reigns, and died at the advanced age of 108 years. The parsonage-house, an indifferent building, to which about twenty-seven acres of glebe land are attached, is situated within three hundred yards of the church, and is the only house near it: it is approached by a very bad road, along which carriages cannot pass. There are places of worship for Independents, Calvinistic Methodists, and Unitarians. Sunday schools are supported by subscription, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children. An ancient stone, with an inscription greatly defaced, and which is supposed to have been part of an old cross, is placed within a hundred yards of the twelfth milestone on the turnpike road from Brecknock to Merthyr, as a gatepost in a wall on the right hand side of the road. These ancient crosses, in remote periods, were used for a variety of purposes: they were principally set up as landmarks, for the division of property; when placed in a hedge, they prohibited foot passengers from making a path across the field; when on the road side, and inscribed with the name of some of the primitive fathers of the British church, they were intended to denote that Christianity had been preached in that place, and to inspire sentiments of devotion in the minds of travellers. In process of time these religious crosses multiplied exceedingly, and there is scarcely a parish in the principality which did not once contain several of them. There are also numerous carneddau, or heaps of stones, in this parish; two of which are particularly distinguished, and are called respectively Y Garn Wen and Y Garn ddû, or "the white" and "the black cairns." Near to the church is a natural cavern, called Ogov Glaig, from which issues a small brook; and close to it is an artificial mound, or barrow, but nothing is known of its origin, though it may probably have been raised over the remains of some persons of eminence interred here. In various parts of the parish are numerous pannau, or cavities, which are very common in limestone tracts.

Hywel Rhys, a poet of considerable genius, though poor and unlettered, and author of several productions of considerable merit, was born in this parish, and died in 1799. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £133. 14.

VAINOR (VAENOR - LÂS), a township in the parish of GLÂSCOMB, hundred of COLWYN, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (E.) from Builth, containing 311 inhabitants. This township is situated between the Glâscomb and Bryngwyn hills, and a small stream, which flows into the river Edwy, passes through it. It forms one-half of the parish, of which the township of Drewern constitutes the other. At a place called Little Hill are four large upright stones, erected, it is said, to commemorate a battle fought in the neighbourhood.

VAINOR (VAENOR), a township in the parish of NANTMEL, hundred of RHAIADR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (E.N.E.) from Rhaiadr, containing 315 inhabitants, the population having increased nearly one-third since the census of 1821. It comprises a vale in the upper part of the parish, near the source of the Dulas stream, which flows into the river Ithon.

VAINOR ISA (VAENOR - ISÂV), a township in that part of the parish of LLANBADARN-VAWR which is in the lower division of the hundred of GENEU'R GLYN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 1 mile (N.N.E.) from Aberystwith, containing 186 inhabitants. It lies on the sea-coast, and contains several pleasing residences. The Duke of Leeds, as lord of the manor of Vainor, receives five shillings per ton on the coal brought coastwise to Aberystwith, by virtue of a grant made by Charles I. A portion of the township is included within the new boundaries of the contributory borough of Aberystwith. The poor are maintained by a separate assessment, the average annual expenditure amounting to £90. 11.

VAINOR UCHA (VAENOR-UCHÂV), a township in that part of the parish of LLANBADARN-VAWR which is in the lower division of the hundred of GENEU'R GLYN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (E.N.E.) from Aberystwith, containing 384 inhabitants. The northern part of this township is partially wooded, and here are a few large upright stones, standing apart, which are apparently of great antiquity; it is bounded on the south by the river Rheidol. The poor are maintained by a separate assessment, the average annual expenditure amounting to £86. 14.

VAN, a hamlet in that part of the parish of BEDWAS which is in the hundred of CAERPHILLY, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 1 mile (E.) from Caerphilly, containing 59 inhabitants. The remainder of the parish is in the hundred of Wenttloog, county of Monmouth, and is connected with this hamlet by Bedwas bridge, across the river Romney, which separates the two counties. It is separately assessed for the maintenance of its poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £24. 12.

VARCHWEL, a township in the parish of GUILDSFIELD, partly in the hundred of POOL, and partly in the liberties of the borough of WELSHPOOL, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (N.E.) from Welshpool. The population is included in the return for the parish. The Guilsfield branch of the Montgomeryshire canal commences near this place.

VELINDRE (TRÊV Y VELIN), a joint hamlet with Trêgoed, in that part of the parish of GLÂSBURY which is in the hundred of TALGARTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (S. W.) from Hay, containing 464 inhabitants. It is situated at the north-western extremity of the Black Mountains of Talgarth. Trêgoed, in the hamlet of that name, is the seat of Viscount Hereford; and in the hamlet of Velindre is Gwernyveth, formerly that of the family of Williams, but now a farm-house, and the property of Col. Wood, in right of his mother, who was the daughter of the late Sir Edward Williams. At Velindre there was formerly a chapel of ease, which was demolished about the middle of the last century; and here was anciently what was called the Lord's mill, which is implied in the name, signifying "Mill-town." There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents: the latter is endowed with a farm called Blaenau bâch, in this parish, said to have been purchased with the aggregate amount of several small bequests and donations, and now yielding an annual rental of £20. In 1612, Sir David Williams, of Gwernyveth, left twenty shillings per ann., to be paid out of the tithes of Gwenddwr, towards repairing the road from Velindre to Tyle-glâs; thirty shillings from the same source to the poor of Velindre and Aberllynvi, and £5 per annum, to be distributed either in food or clothing, to the most distressed poor in the neighbourhood of Gwernyveth. The property left for these purposes having very much increased in value, the sum of £4. 2. 2. is now paid towards the repair of the road; £3. 1. 7. as half the bequest for the poor of Velindre and Aberllynvi; and £20. 10. are distributed in meat and clothing. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor of these two places is £273. 5.

VELINDRE, a joint hamlet with Gwempa, in the parish of LLANGENDRIN, hundred of KIDWELLY, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (S. S. E.) from Carmarthen. The population is included in the return for the parish. This hamlet is situated on the northern declivity of some elevated ground, about a mile and a quarter to the south of the parish church.

VENNI-VÂCH, a hamlet in that part of the parish of ST. JOHN the EVANGELIST, BRECKNOCK, which is in the hundred of MERTHYR-CYNOG, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (W.) from Brecknock, containing 119 inhabitants. This place is beautifully situated under a luxuriant wood, facing the south, to which circumstance may be attributed the numerous virandas that embellish the cottages, and add so much to their pleasing and picturesque appearance. The hamlet, which maintains its own poor, is bounded on the west by the river Yscir, and on the south by the Usk. At its western extremity, and in the angle formed by the rivers Usk and Yscir, at their confluence here, stood Caer Vong, or Caer Bannau, the ancient metropolis of Bledodyn ab Maenarch, which was razed to the ground by Bernard Newmarch, who, having defeated him in battle, and usurped his territories, built a fortress for their defence near the confluence of the Honddû with the Usk, for the erection of which the remains of Caer Vong furnished materials, and also for building the town of Brecknock, which rose from its ruins around the newly constructed fortress. This spot, now called "the Gaer," is supposed to have been originally the site of one of the earliest stations of the Romans, in the province of Britannia Secunda. According to Mr. Strange, who has described it in the Archæologia, it forms a quadrilateral area, six hundred and twenty-four feet in length, and four hundred and twenty-six feet wide, rounded at the angles. The foundation of the wall by which it is enclosed is still entire, and is seven feet in thickness: in some places this wall is remaining to the height of from three to six feet above the ground, with some of the facings entire. A fragment of brick, inscribed LEG. II. AVG., two gold coins of the Emperor Nero, and a silver coin of Trajan, discovered at this place, were, according to Mr. Strange, in the possession of the proprietor of the soil. About a quarter of a mile from the farm-house now occupying part of the area, in a lane leading to Brecknock, there is a stone, about six feet in height, having two figures rudely cut on it in relief, and part of an inscription, of which only the words ET CONIVNX EIVS EST are now legible. At a short distance from the Gaer, towards the east, were the lines of a British encampment, plainly discernible till overspread by the luxuriant woods of Venni, by which they are now entirely concealed, and consequently not to be traced without the greatest difficulty. At the distance of a mile to the north-east is Pen y Crûg, one of the largest and most perfect remains of the strong holds of the ancient Britons in South Wales: its form is elliptical, including an area nearly six hundred yards in circuit, defended all round by three high ramparts, which are for the greater part entire: it occupies a commanding situation on the summit of a lofty hill, overlooking the town of Brecknock, and having the only entrance on the east. The prospect from this height is very extensive and exceedingly beautiful, comprehending the Vale of Usk, with the winding course of the river from below Bwlch to the tastefully disposed and richly varied grounds of Penpont and Abercamlais: on the south rises the magnificent chain of mountains called the Beacons, and on the north is the small but highly picturesque Vale of Honddû. Among the numerous interesting objects which this splendid view embraces are, the ivy-mantled ruins of Brecknock castle; the venerable towers of the priory and St. Mary's churches; the luxuriant woods of Pennoyre, Frwdgrêch, Dinas, Penpont, and Venni; and the numberless heights of varied aspect which fill up this extensive tract of country, abounding in beauty and variety, and combining the most prominent features of pleasingly picturesque and strikingly romantic scenery. On an eminence formerly called Pen Cevn y Gaer, and now Slwch Tump, at the eastern extremity of the parish, are the remains of an encampment, similar in form to that of Pen y Crûg, but of smaller dimensions, defended by a double fosse, which is in some places nearly destroyed. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £114. 18.

VERWIC (Y-VERWIG), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of TROEDYRAUR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{4}$  miles (N.) from Cardigan, containing 439 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the coast of St. George's channel, is celebrated in the Welsh annals for the memorable and sanguinary resistance opposed by the natives to a body of invading Flemings, who had effected a landing on a part of the beach, called Traeth y Mount; and in the desperate battle which ensued these invaders were defeated with dreadful carnage, and their dead bodies were strewn in heaps on the sands. This conflict took place on the first Sunday after New year's day, which, from that event, was called Sul Côch, or "the Red Sunday," near a farm named Nant y Flynion, from the small brook in the neighbourhood, near which the enemy landed. The bones of the slaughtered Flemings buried on the coast are still discoverable when the sands are scattered by the winds. The parish is skirted by the river Teivy, which abounds with salmon, trout, turbot, dories, sewin, and various other kinds of fish, in taking which the inhabitants are chiefly employed during the season. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £10. 13. 4., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Pedrog, is a small ancient edifice, with a tower, and consists of a nave and chancel, separated by a large pointed arch: the nave communicates with the tower by a similar arch of smaller dimensions: the ancient font is elaborately ornamented, and over the porch is the date 1627. On a tenement in this parish there is a barrow, from which it has obtained the name of Crûg, but nothing is known of its origin. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £201. 13.

VORLAN, a hamlet in that part of the parish of St. Mary's which is in the hundred of DUNGLEDY, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (N. by W.) from Narberth, containing 93 inhabitants. This hamlet is of very small extent: the vicar of the parish was formerly the only inhabitant of it assessed to the relief of the poor; and even now the average annual expenditure for that purpose amounts only to £2. 10.

VRITHOED, a joint township with Cyfeiliog, in the parish of CYFEILIOG, hundred of RUTHIN, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES. The population is included in the return for the parish. In 1731, John Morris bequeathed some land, which produces a small sum, towards the support of a schoolmaster and for apprenticing poor children of this township.

VRO, a parcel in the parish of LLANGYNIDER, hundred of CRICKHOWEL, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, containing 506 inhabitants. The parish church is situated in this parcel, which is bounded on the north-east by the river Usk, and on the north-west by the Crawnion brook, which flows into that river near where an ancient castle is said to have stood. A bridge crosses the former, on the line of road leading from Crickhowel to Brecknock and to Talgarth. The Brecknock canal passes through it, along the western bank of the Usk. The hills abound with limestone, the quarrying and burning of which afford employment to many of the inhabitants. A separate assessment is made for the relief of the poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £214. 12.

VRO, a hamlet in the parish of LLANTHETTY, hundred of PENCELLE, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (N.) from Merthyr-Tydvil, containing 331 inhabitants. It comprises a portion of the upper part of the vale of the Lesser Taf, which contains some pleasing scenery, and includes Taf-Vechan chapel, the living of which is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Rector of Llanthetty.

VYNNE FINAU, a lordship in the parish of ABERGUILLY, lower division of the hundred of ELVET, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES. The population is included in the return for the parish. This place belongs to the Bishops of St. David's, and it possesses some peculiar privileges, distinct from the rest of the parish. A court leet is regularly held, and a portreeve and constables are appointed for it. A rate is also collected for the repair of the roads of this district, exclusively of that for the rest of the parish; but there is no separate assessment for the maintenance of the poor.

W.

WALTON, a joint township with Womaston, in that part of the parish of OLD RADNOR which is within the liberties of the borough of NEW RADNOR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (E.) from New Radnor, containing, with Womaston, 186 inhabitants. This township is situated on the road from Kington to New Radnor, which is here crossed by another from Discoed. A tributary of the Somergil brook flows through it. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor, conjointly with Womaston, amounts to £140. 3.

WALTON (EAST), a parish in the hundred of DUNGLEDY, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (N. N. E.) from Haverfordwest, containing 229 inhabitants. This parish formerly constituted a part of the ample possessions of the commandery of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem at Slebech, to which establishment it was given by its Norman proprietor, Walter de Wale, from whom it derived its name Wale's town, or Walton. The scenery, though by no means rich, is less dreary than in some other parts of the county; and Penty Park, formerly the residence of a branch of the family of Philipps, of Pieton Castle, with its grounds, forms a pleasing and ornamental feature in the landscape. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the alternate patronage of Earl Cawdor and the parishioners, the latter having the next presentation. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a very small rude edifice, consisting only of a nave, without either tower or spire. The sum of £5 per annum, subsequently reduced to £3, and now discontinued, was left by the late Mr. Philipps, of Tenby, chargeable on his estate of Penty Park, for the instruction of seven poor children of this parish. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £91. 17.

WALTON (WEST), a parish in the hundred of RHÔS, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (W. by S.) from Haverfordwest, containing 411 inhabitants. This parish is situated upon the coast of St. Bride's bay, by which it is bounded on the west. The surrounding country is destitute of beauty, but the view over the bay is enlivened by the passing and repassing of vessels. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and endowed with £400 royal bounty. The church is not entitled to architectural notice. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £76. 8.

WALWYN'S CASTLE, a parish in the hundred of RHÔS, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (S. W. by W.) from Haverfordwest, containing 311 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on St. Bride's bay, is called by the Welsh Castell Gwalchmai, a name probably derived from the tradition that Gwalchmai, cousin of King Arthur, and a warrior of gigantic stature, having been driven from his inheritance in Galway, was wrecked off this coast, and interred here; and his remains are said to have been found in the reign of William the Conqueror. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £7. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. James, is an ancient edifice, not remarkable for any architectural details. A tumulus near it is supposed to mark the site of the ancient castle, but no particulars of its foundation or history are known: there are no vestiges of buildings of any kind, and the artificial mound may probably be only a sepulchral memorial raised over the remains of Gwalchmai, or some other chieftain. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £139. 9.

WARREN, a parish in the hundred of CASTLE-MARTIN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (S. W.) from Pembroke, containing 169 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated in the south-western part of the county, is of considerable extent, reaching to the coast of the Bristol channel, by which it is bounded on the south and south-west. It includes the small village of Lenny, on the western coast, from which a point of land, projecting into the sea, derives its name of Lenny Head. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4. 8. 1½., endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is an ancient building with a square tower, surmounted by a spire of stone, forming a conspicuous object on this part of the coast. In the churchyard is the pedestal of an ancient cross, in which is inserted the head of one of the circular kind. According to tradition, there was an ancient religious house on a farm called Warren; but there are no remains of it, and the only records of its existence are the names of several places in the immediate neighbourhood, which would appear to have been derived from such an establishment. Vestiges of an ancient fortification, of circular form, and still in good preservation, may be seen in a field between this place and the parish church of St. Twinnel: it was defended by a triple rampart, having an entrance on the west side, and appears to have been a place of great strength; the area within the inner rampart, which is the most entire, is about one acre in extent. It appears to have formed a link in a chain of fortifications by which the south-western coasts were protected from the piratical incursions of the Saxons and Danes. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £123. 19.

WELSHPOOL, a borough, market and assize town, having exclusive jurisdiction, in the county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 7½ miles (N.) from Montgomery, and 175 (N. W. by W.) from London, on the road from Shrewsbury to Aberystwith: the parish comprises the Upper, Middle, and Lower divisions, and the township of Cyfronnydd, each of which separately maintains its own poor, and contains 4536 inhabitants, of which number, 673 are in the Upper, 2538 in the Middle, and 1269 in the Lower, division, and the remaining 56 in the township of Cyfronnydd. The original name of this place, written "Trellyn," from the Welsh "Trê'r Llŷn," was derived from its situation near a pool or lake of very great depth. From this circumstance, also, it obtained its present English appellation of Pool; and, in order to distinguish it from the town of that name in the county of Dorset, it has long been generally called Welshpool. This lake, which is now within the park of Powis Castle, is nearly three hundred feet in depth, and, from the dark colour of its waters, had obtained the appellation of Llŷn Dŵ, or "the Black Lake," since corrupted into "Llyndy Pool." The town is of ancient origin: the first notice of it occurs in the Welsh annals of 1109, when Cadwgan ab Bleddyn ab Cynvyn, a powerful native chieftain of Powys, having succeeded, even during the state of anarchy prevailing at that time, in reducing his territories to some degree of order and tranquillity, by a rigid and impartial administration of justice, repaired to this place, and began to erect a castle, which he intended to make his principal residence, and the seat of his government. But this virtuous prince, whom Camden dignifies with the epithet of the "renowned Briton," was, during his abode at this place, suddenly attacked by his nephew Madoc, a lawless chieftain of North Wales, at the head of a numerous band of desperate and profligate followers, who, taking him by surprise, murdered him before he had time either to defend himself, or to take measures for his escape. On the death of Cadwgan, the castle which he had begun was left unfinished; but the work was resumed and completed by Gwenwynwyn, who succeeded his father, Owain Cyveiliog, in the government of the southern part of Powysland. In the year 1191, in resentment of various depredations which had been committed by the Welsh on the English vassals in the marches, Hubert, Archbishop of Canterbury, in the absence of Richard I. in the Holy Land, besieged this castle with a powerful force. The garrison made a determined resistance, and held out till the walls were undermined, when they surrendered on honourable terms. The archbishop, having taken possession of the fortress, repaired the damage it had sustained during the siege, strengthened the defences, and, placing in it a strong garrison, returned into England. Gwenwynwyn, its rightful owner, determined to use every effort for the recovery of this castle, which was the most important fortress in his dominions, laid siege to it in 1197, and soon compelled the English garrison to surrender it to him, upon the same terms as had been granted to his own soldiers. At this time the castle was distinguished by the appellation of "Gwenwynwyn's Castle at the Pool," and became the chief residence of that prince and his successors.

In the reign of John, Gwenwynwyn, having consented to become a vassal of the English crown, and to hold his territories in capite under that monarch, his son and successor Gruffydd, on his accession to the government, did homage to the English king, and by his tenure was bound to aid and assist him in his endeavours to subjugate the principality to the authority of the English government. Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, Prince of North Wales, incensed at the defection of Gruffydd from the interests of his countrymen, in the year 1233, attacked and dismantled his castle at Pool, called at that time, from the colour of the stone of which it was built, Y Castell Côch, or "the red castle," an appellation which it still retains among the native Welsh. Upon this occasion Llewelyn banished Gruffydd and gave his territories to Gruffydd ab Madoc, Prince of Upper Powys, and Lord of Dinas Brân. Owain ab Gruffydd, grandson of Gwenwynwyn, still, under the protection of the English, appears nevertheless to have retained possession of his father's territories as an English vassal; and at his death he bequeathed them to his only daughter and heiress, Hawys, surnamed Gadarn, or "the Hardy." After her father's decease the title of Hawys to the principality of Powys was disputed by her four uncles Llewelyn, John, Gruffydd Vychan, and David, all alleging the ineligibility of a female to succeed to that dignity. Under these circumstances Hawys appealed to Edward II., the reigning English monarch, who gave her in marriage to John de Charlton, whom the king ennobled by the title of Baron Powys, and in whose descendants the proprietorship of the castle and its dependencies remained for several generations. It was probably at this period that the fortress first obtained the appellation of Powys Castle, which it still retains. The barony and castle were, by marriage with Jane, eldest daughter of Edward Lord Powys, conveyed to Sir John Grey of Heton, who was slain at the unfortunate battle of Baugée, in 1421; and in the reign of Elizabeth, Edward Grey, an illegitimate son of Edward Grey de Powys, who had inherited the estates by virtue of a settlement on his mother, sold them to Sir Edward Herbert, second son of William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke. Sir Edward, on his death, was interred in the church of Welshpool, and was succeeded in his titles and estates by his son William, who was made Knight of the Bath at the coronation of James I., and by Charles I. created Lord Powys.

On the breaking out of the civil war of the seventeenth century, Piercy Lord Powys, declared himself an advocate of the royal cause, fortified his castle, and placed in it a strong garrison, of which he took the command in person. It was soon afterwards besieged by a strong party of the parliamentary forces, under the command of Sir Thomas Myddelton; and its outer walls having been materially damaged by the artillery of the assailants, it was at length reduced, the noble commander of the garrison was made prisoner, and the place given up to pillage. Upon this occasion the castle and lordship were confiscated to the use of the parliament; and, according to the general orders issued at the time, the proprietor of the estate was allowed to compound with the parliament, by which means he regained possession of them. It appears by a manuscript in the library at Powis Castle that this fortress, together with that of Montgomery, with their outworks, were ordered by the parliament to be demolished; but by a decree of the council of state, dated April 28th, 1660, it is stated that the "Red Castle in Wales" did not belong to the state, and that the owners and proprietors thereof, having given security that it should not be employed or made use of to the disturbance of the peace of the nation, or prejudicial to the parliament and commonwealth, it is commanded that the former order made for demolishing the above-named castle shall be null and void, so far as regards the Red Castle, with the exception only of the outworks, and the making of some breaches in the walls, in order to render it indefensible in case of any future insurrection against the government and authority of the parliament. After these injunctions had been carried into effect, it was delivered into the possession of its legitimate proprietors, in whose descendants it still remains; the Rt. Hon. Edward Herbert, Viscount Clive, eldest son of the Earl of Powis, being the present proprietor.

The town, which Leland describes as being, in the reign of Henry VIII., "the best market in Powys," still retains that character, in addition to which it may be justly regarded as the modern capital of the county. It is situated for the greater part in a hollow, which opens towards the river Severn, and extends up the acclivity of an eminence towards Powis park and castle: it consists of two towns, called respectively Pool town and Welsh town, but which are now so entirely united, as to form but one. It is large and populous, well lighted with gas, and consists of one long and wide street, intersected at right angles by another of similar character, and also by several streets of smaller extent, all well paved and amply supplied with water: the houses are handsomely built of brick, and with an unusual degree of regularity for this part of the country; and the whole has a cheerful and prepossessing appearance, having more the character of an English, than that of a Welsh, town. This impression, which strikes the stranger on his entrance, is strengthened both by the prevailing language and the manners of the inhabitants, the Welsh language being spoken by few, except such as come from the upper part of the country upon business. The flannel manufacture is carried on here, but upon a scale much inferior to its extent either at Llanidloes or Newtown; and it has long been the principal mart for the sale of the flannels made throughout the whole of the manufacturing district of North Wales, but some spirited efforts are now being made to remove this market to Newtown. A considerable trade is also carried on in malt, for the making of which there are several kilns in the town and neighbourhood; and there are likewise several tanneries upon a large scale. At the extremity of the town are some quarries of excellent stone, near which is a military dépôt for one thousand stand of arms. The river Severn is navigable to within a short distance of the town; and the Montgomeryshire canal, which passes close to it, joins the Ellesmere canal near Oswestry, affording a facility of communication with Shrewsbury and all parts of the kingdom. The market, which is amply supplied with provisions of every kind, is on Monday; and fairs are held on the second Monday in March, April 17th, June 5th, the first Monday after the 10th of July, September 12th, and November 16th, for horses, cattle, and pedlery; and on the day preceding each a fair is held for the sale of sheep and pigs: a fair is also held on the first Monday after the 20th of September, exclusively for the sale of butter and cheese. A great cattle market is held annually on the first Monday after St. Hilary, and also on the Monday before Christmas-day. The flannel market is held every alternate Thursday, in a spacious room appropriated to that purpose in the town-hall, and has hitherto been attended by numerous dealers and manufacturers from Llanidloes, Newtown, &c.: the average quantity sold at these markets is one thousand pieces, of which the finer sort generally measure about one hundred and twenty yards in length. Welshpool is supplied with coal from the north-western parts of Shropshire, by means of the Montgomeryshire canal; and the river Severn commences its navigable course at only a short distance from the town, at a place called Pool-Stake.

The inhabitants received a charter of incorporation at a very early period, from the lords of Powys, who invested them with various privileges and immunities, which were subsequently confirmed by a charter granted by James I., in the 12th of his reign, and confirmed and enlarged by Charles II. The corporation, under this charter, consists of two bailiffs, and an indefinite number of aldermen and burgesses, with a high steward, recorder, town-clerk, coroner, two serjeants at mace, two yeomen, and other officers. The bailiffs are elected annually on Michaelmas day, by a jury of resident burgesses; the high steward, who holds his office for life, is appointed by the lord of Powys, who also nominates the town-clerk: and the recorder is chosen by the bailiffs, aldermen, and burgesses: the bailiffs, on retiring from office, become aldermen. The coroner is appointed by the high steward and bailiffs; and the serjeants at mace and yeomen, by the bailiffs for the time being. This was originally one of the contributory boroughs which, with Montgomery, returned one member to parliament under the statute of the 27th of Henry VIII.; and the right of election, which was vested in the burgesses generally, continued to be exercised from that time till the year 1728, when the borough was disfranchised by a resolution of the House of Commons, which, however, being in direct opposition to a previous resolution of the House, by which, in 1680, the right was confirmed, the burgesses were empowered, by the act of the 28th of George III., to assert their right of voting for a member for Montgomery before any future committee of the House, and to enter an appeal against any future decision, within twelve calendar months; but no measures were ever taken to regain the franchise. By the recent act to amend the representation, Welshpool has been restored to the exercise of the elective franchise, and is again made contributory with Llanidloes, Llanvyllin, Machynlleth, Montgomery, and Newtown, in returning a member. The right of election is now vested in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act directs: the present number of such tenements within the electoral limits of the borough, which are less extensive than the ancient municipal boundary, and are minutely detailed in the Appendix, is about two hundred. The freedom of the borough is inherited by the sons of freemen, or acquired by election of the burgesses at large, subject to the approval of the high steward. The bailiffs, the high steward, and the recorder, are justices of the peace within the borough, and by charter have power to punish for all offences committed within its limits, in as ample a manner as the county magistrates, who have no concurrent jurisdiction. The exclusive jurisdiction of the borough extends over the entire parishes of Pool and Buttington; the whole townships of Gungrog Vechan, Trelydan, and Trêvnant Vechan, with parts of those of Garth, Hendrehên, Llan, Trawscoed, Llanerch-rochwell, Tyrymynach, and Varchwel, in the parish of Guilsfield; the townships of Gaer, Sylvaen, Trêv-Helyg, and Trêvnant, with parts of those of Cwm and Castle, in the parish of Castle Caer Einion; and the township of Brithdir, in the parish of Berriew. The corporation hold courts of quarter session for determining on all offences committed within the borough, the punishment for which does not extend to the loss of life or limb; and a court of record every alternate Tuesday, in which the bailiffs preside, for the recovery of debts to any amount. The assizes for the county, and the petty sessions for the hundreds of Pool and Cawrse, are held in this town. The town-hall, erected at the expense of a few gentlemen residing within the vicinity of the town, to avoid increasing the county rate, which was previously overcharged, is a handsome and commodious building of brick, in the centre of the principal street, with a colonnade in front: the basement story is appropriated to the use of the corn market, with an ample space for the sale of various articles of merchandise, and a spacious court-room for holding the assizes, the borough sessions, and other courts: in the upper story there is a commodious and handsome room, originally sixty-two feet in length, twenty-five feet wide, and eighteen feet high, but which, in 1824, was enlarged for the holding of the Eisteddvod, and is now one hundred and two feet long, in which public meetings take place, the business of the corporation is transacted, and the flannel market is held, and in which also balls are occasionally given.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £13. 5. 2½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, and, with the exception of the chancel and the tower, rebuilt in 1774, is a spacious and handsome structure, in the early style of English architecture, with a lofty square embattled tower, and consists of a nave, chancel, and north and south aisles: it was enlarged by the addition of galleries in 1824. The ceiling of the chancel is divided into compartments, embellished with rich carved work, and from the roof of the north aisle grows some pendant ivy, which has a very singular appearance. Among the communion plate there is a chalice of fine gold, containing one quart, and valued at £170: engraved on it is a Latin inscription, stating it to have been presented to the church of Pool, by Thomas Davies, Governor-General of the English Colonies on the western coast of Africa, in gratitude for the preservation of his life during his residence in that unhealthy clime. There is a gradual ascent from the flat part of the town to the church, which stands at the base of a loftier eminence; so that the cemetery, which lies on the acclivity, is in some parts higher than the church itself, and commands a fine view of the town beneath. It has for some time been in contemplation to obtain additional burial-ground for this town, and His Majesty's Commissioners have expressed their readiness to afford facilities for the accomplishment of so desirable an object. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A National school for children of both sexes was founded in 1821, and is supported by subscription: the building erected for this purpose, and situated at a short distance from the town, on the road to Newtown, is a handsome stone edifice, occupying three sides of a quadrangle, and consisting of two commodious and spacious school-rooms, with apartments for the master and the mistress: in these schools one hundred and forty boys, and one hundred and three girls, are at present gratuitously instructed. Richard Tudor, Esq., bequeathed £100 for teaching ten poor boys, and Edward Parry, in 1770, also bequeathed £100 for teaching eight: the interest of both these sums is appropriated to the maintenance of a school in which these children are instructed; and there is also another school, founded by Mr. Tudor, who bequeathed £40, the interest to be paid to a master or mistress for teaching ten younger children to read. The same gentleman also left £80, directing the produce to be appropriated to the apprenticing of one poor boy annually. An almshouse near the church was founded by the late H. P. Dorsett, Esq., who endowed it for eight poor women; and a dispensary has been established, which is well supported by subscription.

Powis Castle, the seat of Lord Clive, is a stately but irregular pile of building, of great extent, and venerable for its antiquity: it is pleasantly situated in a well-wooded park, at the distance of a mile from the town, on the right of the road leading to Montgomery, and occupies an elevated and commanding site on a ridge of rock overlooking a vast extent of richly diversified country, the greater part of which was formerly subject to its lords. It is built of red sandstone, from which circumstance it derived the appellation of Castell Côch, which it still retains among the Welsh. The damage it sustained during the parliamentary war has been amply repaired; and the whole has been fitted up in a style of grandeur. Considerable improvements have been made in its external appearance, under the auspices of its present proprietor, by removing the sash windows which had been inserted more than a century ago, and restoring others of the original form, more in conformity with the prevailing style of architecture, and by a considerable addition to the height of the tower on the north side. The entrance is by an ancient gateway, flanked by two massive circular towers, into an extensive paved area, round which the principal apartments are ranged. The ascent to these is by a magnificent staircase embellished with paintings by Lanscrome: the walls on each side are painted with mythological and allegorical subjects, among which are representations of Neptune, Amphitrite, Apollo, and Venus, and emblematical personifications of Poetry, Painting, Music, the Fates, and other subjects: the ceiling is painted with the coronation of Queen Anne. In the lower part of the hall there is a painting of Aurora, and near it is a marble figure of Cybele, in a sitting posture, about three feet high, on a pedestal of marble, exquisitely sculptured, which was brought from Herculaneum; and on the upper landing of the staircase there is a beautiful statue of Apollo Belvidere. This staircase leads to a gallery, one hundred and seventeen feet in length, and twenty feet wide, in which are ranged the busts of the twelve Cæsars, brought from Italy, two mosaic tables from Rome, and four small figures in marble, of very great antiquity. The walls of the gallery are of panelled oak, enriched with armorial bearings of different branches of the family; and the ceiling is an ancient relic of the elaborately ornamented style in plaster. One end of the gallery communicates with the state bedroom, which is preserved in the same order as when prepared for the reception of Charles I., who was expected to sleep here when on his route to Chester. The dining-room, saloon, and library, are all splendidly decorated, and contain some beautiful and valuable antiques, among which are some exquisite sculptures from the ruins of Herculaneum. The ceiling of the dining-room is highly embellished with painting, in which the daughters of William, second Marquis of Powys, are represented in various characters, and with appropriate attributes. In the saloon is a full-length portrait of Roger Palmer, Earl of Castlemain, in the costume of his day, and numerous family portraits by the best masters; and in the library there is a manuscript history of the life of Lord Herbert. The ball-room, of the same dimensions as the gallery, was formerly connected with the main building by a portion of the castle, which was destroyed by fire, so that it is now detached from it: many of the original windows in that portion of the building are still remaining, though almost concealed by the ivy with which they are overspread. At the end of the ball-room is a billiard-room, the walls of which are ornamented with glass cases, containing an elegant variety of stuffed birds, and other curiosities. On the east side of the castle are terraces formed in the rock on which it is built, rising in succession above each other, and laid out in flower gardens, with green and hot-houses, containing a choice collection of rare and valuable plants. The lower terrace leads to a delightful walk, shaded with trees of every variety; and from the north-east angle of the castle there is a terrace, which was most probably formed by the excavation of the rock for the stone with which the castle is built, commanding a fine view of the richly wooded vale of the Severn, with the town of Welshpool, beyond which are seen the 'Rallt and Moel y Golva, and the Breiddin hills, and an extensive tract of the surrounding country. The park, which is very extensive and richly wooded, lies on the acclivity of a hill, of which the summit is two miles distant from the castle, and from which, in clear weather, may be seen the mountains of Plinlimmon, Cader Idris, Snowdon, the Arans, the Arenigs, and various others. A winding road through it leads to the castle, which is frequently lost to the view of the spectator on his approach, and is seen emerging again from the luxuriant foliage by which it had been concealed. The park is ornamented with numerous rustic seats, and the walk through these delightfully varied grounds, which are open to the public, is a source of much enjoyment to the inhabitants of the town. Among the gentlemen's seats in the neighbourhood is Llanerchydol, the seat of David Pugh, Esq., a modern castellated mansion of stone, beautifully situated on the acclivity of a hill rising gradually from the town, from which is an ascent by a winding road, commanding magnificent prospects: the grounds are tastefully laid out, and comprehend much varied and beautifully picturesque scenery.

At a short distance from the town was the ancient monastery of Monachlog Ystrad Marchell, or Strata Marcella, founded in 1170 by Owain Cyveiliog, son of Gruffydd, for monks of the Cistercian order; but, according to other authorities, by Madoc, another son, to whom Tanner attributes the refounding of it, though, by his charter, he appears only to have granted to it a portion of land on which to found a cell. In the early part of the reign of Edward III., the Welsh monks were removed to English monasteries, and English monks introduced into this establishment, which was made subject to the abbey of Buildwas. It flourished till the dissolution, at which time its revenue, according to Dugdale, was estimated at £64. 14. 2., and according to Speed, at £73. 7. 3.: there are no remains of the edifice, and the only memorial of it is preserved in the ancient site, which is still pointed out. At a short distance to the east of the town are the remains of an ancient British encampment, in a good state of preservation; and on the summit of the mound which it comprises are some stately elm trees. Dr. William Morgan was instituted vicar of this parish in 1575: he was afterwards removed to Llanrhaidr yn Mochnant, whence he was preferred to the see of Llandaf, in 1595, from which he was translated in 1601 to that of St. Asaph, where he died in 1604. He had a principal share in the translation of the Welsh bible, which was printed in 1588: this edition, revised by Dr. Parry, Bishop of Asaph, in 1604, assisted by his chaplain, Dr. John Davies, and reprinted in 1620, is, with some slight variation, the version now in general use. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor in the entire parish of Welshpool is £1139. 5., of which amount, £299. 17. is defrayed by the Upper, £564. 5. by the Middle, and £299. 17. by the Lower, division, and the remaining £30. 3. by the township of Cyfronnydd.

WEN, a joint hamlet with Genol, in the parish of LLANSAWEL, lower division of the hundred of CAYO, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $9\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N.) from Llandilo-Vawr. The population is returned with the parish, of which it forms the northern and higher portion: it is chiefly hilly, but in many places the sides of the glens are well planted with timber. An assessment is made for the support of the poor conjointly with Genol, the average annual expenditure amounting to £182. 5.

WENVOE, a parish in the hundred of DINAS-POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (S. W. by W.) from Cardiff, containing 432 inhabitants. The ancient Welsh name of this place is supposed to have been "Gwynva," or "Gwynvai," of which the present is a Norman modification. The parish, which is situated in the south-eastern part of the county, comprises a large extent of enclosed arable and pasture land, and some portions of common, affording good pasturage for sheep. It had formerly an ancient castle, which is noticed by Leland as in a ruinous state even in his time, consisting only of one tower and some fragments of the walls, within a quarter of a mile of which the same writer describes a well, enclosed by a wall, out of which issued a stream called Silly brook. The present castle, the seat of Robert F. Jenner, Esq., erected by the late P. Birt, Esq., maternal grandfather of the present proprietor, is a stately mansion, consisting of a centre and two wings. The principal front, facing the south, extends three hundred and seventy-four feet in length, and is three stories in height, exclusively of the basement and the attics: the wings, which, according to the original design, were to have formed two magnificent conservatories, terminate at each extremity in a square tower, and the intervals between the towers and the centre are partly concealed by trees, with a view to relieve the flatness of such a length of masonry. The grounds are laid out with much taste, and comprehend some rich and beautifully varied scenery; but the view from the house, though pleasing, is neither grand nor extensive. The village is neat and of prepossessing appearance: the soil is a damp clay, but the air is salubrious, and the parish registers afford several instances of longevity, among which are the ages of the three last incumbents, each of whom held the living for half a century. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £13. 7. 1., and in the patronage of Robert Francis Jenner, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a handsome structure, in the later style of English architecture, with a square embattled tower. The interior is appropriately arranged and kept in excellent order: it contains some good mural monuments in memory of the several proprietors of Wenvoe castle. The churchyard is pleasingly laid out, and the graves are decked with various odoriferous plants: near the church grows a remarkably fine yew tree, in excellent preservation, which is said to be one of the oldest in the county. The parsonage-house, built by the late P. Birt, Esq., is a handsome and spacious edifice. Elizabeth Thomas, in 1701, bequeathed £20; Sir Edmund Thomas, Bart., in 1721, £40; Mary Thomas, £10; William Morgan, £5; and the Rev. John Hodges, rector, in 1777, £45, to the poor of the parish; the income arising from which several sums is annually distributed among them, according to the intentions of the several benefactors. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £258. 3.

WEPPRE (WEPRE), a township in the parish of NORTHOP, Northop division of the hundred of COLES-HILL, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (S. E.) from Flint, containing 354 inhabitants. This township was anciently held by William de Malbedeng, under the church of Chester. In Domesday book it is noticed as possessing a wood a league and a half long, and having two villeyns and two boors, and in another place as having one villeyn and a radman, having been in the possession of Ernui, a freeman. It is situated on the æstuary of the Dee, and comprises a portion of its sands, which are dry at low water, and may probably at some future period be brought into cultivation. The fishery affords employment to many of its inhabitants, who share in the advantages of the stone pier at Golvtyn, erected by the River Dee Company, for the protection of vessels proceeding to and from Chester, which serves also to shelter their craft.

WESTOAC (WESTOWE), a hamlet in the parish of LLANELLY, hundred of CARNWALLON, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, containing 723 inhabitants. Here was formerly an ancient chapel, which has fallen into ruins.

WESTON-MADOC, a township in that part of the parish of CHURCHSTOKE which is in the lower division of the hundred of CAWRSE, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (S.) from Montgomery, containing 237 inhabitants. It is included in the manor of Cawrse, which belongs to the Earl of Powis, and is situated near the border of the English county of Salop, in which part of the parish is comprised.

WEYTHEL (GWYTHEL), a township, partly in the parish of GLADESTRY, hundred of RADNOR, and partly in the parish of OLD RADNOR, within the liberties of the town of NEW RADNOR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (S.E. by S.) from New Radnor. The population is included in the return for the respective parishes. The Weythel brook, on which there are several mills, and which is crossed by the road from Kington, flows through it, in a narrow vale exhibiting various detached plantations. Lady Hartstongue bequeathed a considerable plot of land for the instruction of poor children of this township.

WHITCHURCH, a parish, partly in the hundred of CAERPHILLY, and partly in that of KIBBOR, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (N.N.W.) from Cardiff, containing 1184 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the turnpike road leading from Cardiff to Merthyr-Tydvil, and comprises the Upper and Lower divisions, the former of which, by a decision of the county magistrates at the quarter sessions, in April 1831, is now in the hundred of Kibbor. It includes an extensive tract of enclosed arable and pasture land, part of which is an allotment of Cardiff heath, on its enclosure many years ago. The soil is in general fertile, and favourable to the production of wheat and other grain: the surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, and agreeably enlivened by some handsome seats in the immediate vicinity. Green Meadow, the residence of Wyndham Lewis, Esq., is a spacious and handsome modern mansion, in the later style of English architecture, delightfully situated above the river Tâf, and under the declivity of a lofty mountain: the grounds are tastefully laid out, comprehending a rich variety of beautiful scenery, and commanding a fine view of the picturesque ruins of Castell Côch, to the north, built by Ivor ab Cadivor, called also Ivor Bâch, to defend the pass up the valley of the Tâf. Velindre, the pleasant seat of T. W. Brookes, Esq., situated on an eminence above Melin Gruffydd, commands some delightful views of the river Tâf, and the flourishing plantations that ornament its banks in the parish of Pentyrch. The extensive tin plate works belonging to Messrs. R. Blakemore and Co., at Melin Gruffydd, are in this parish: in these works about five hundred persons are constantly employed, and on the average about twenty-five thousand boxes of tin plates, and two thousand tons of sheet iron, are annually manufactured, the conveyance of which to their destination is facilitated by the Glamorganshire canal, which passes close to the works. The living is annexed to that of Llandaf, and is in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a neat and substantial edifice, in good repair. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Joan Williams, in 1707, bequeathed £20, and Thomas Lewis, in 1724, £5 for the benefit of the poor. In this parish there are, an encampment supposed to be of Roman construction, and a lofty tumulus; but nothing is known of their origin. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £245. 9.

WHITCHURCH, a parish in the hundred of DEW-ISLAND, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 12 miles (N.W. by W.) from Haverfordwest, containing 1028 inhabitants. This parish, which contains the small seaport town of Solva, described under its own head, is situated on the coast of St. Bride's bay, and on the turnpike road from Haverfordwest to St. David's. It comprises a considerable tract of good arable and pasture land: the surface is abruptly varied, and the scenery, being pleasingly diversified with hill and dale, is in some parts, especially near the town, highly picturesque. The inhabitants are chiefly employed in agriculture, in the burning of lime, for which there are some kilns near the entrance of the town of Solva, and in the trade of the port. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5. 15. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ ., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Precentor and Chapter of the Cathedral Church of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. David, is not remarkable for any architectural details of importance. There are places of worship for Baptists, Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, and Presbyterians. Caervoriog, in this parish, is the birthplace of Adam Hoton, Bishop of St. David's, at one time ambassador to the Court of France, and Lord High Chancellor of England. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £304. 19.

WHITECHURCH, or EGLWYS-WEN, a parish in the hundred of KEMMES, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (S. by W.) from Cardigan, containing 377 inhabitants. This parish, which is supposed to have derived its name from the white colour of the stone of which the original church was built, is situated in a retired part of the county, at a distance from any turnpike road. It comprises a large tract of enclosed arable and pasture land, a considerable tract of mountainous common, affording pasturage for sheep, and some good turbaries, from which the inhabitants are supplied with fuel. The soil is various, and the inhabitants are principally employed in agriculture: the stone in this part of the country contains a great proportion of quartz, which is found in abundance within the parish. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Thomas Lloyd, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents. John Jones, in 1729, bequeathed rent-charges of £1 and ten shillings respectively to the poor of this parish and that of Llanvair Nantgwyn

WHITFORD, a parish in the Holywell division of the hundred of COLESHILL, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (N. W. by W.) from Holywell, containing 3333 inhabitants. This parish rises for the most part gradually from the shore of the wide æstuary of the Dee, by which it is bounded on the east and north-east, into hills of considerable elevation: it comprises an extent of nearly eight thousand statute acres of land, and contains a lake called Llŷn Helig, of about fifty acres. A tract of waste land, including three thousand five hundred acres, lying in the parishes of Whitford, Ysceiviog, and Nannerch, was allotted and enclosed some years ago, pursuant to two acts of parliament obtained for that purpose. The village, which is of small size, but contains several neat houses, is pleasantly situated at no great distance from the Chester and Holyhead road, and near the head of a small valley, which, deepening in its course, stretches towards the sea, having its sides beautifully fringed with woods. The surface of the parish is ornamented with several gentlemen's seats. Mostyn Hall is the property and residence of the Hon. Edward M. Lloyd Mostyn, to whom it was bequeathed by the late Sir Thomas Mostyn, Bart., whose name he assumed: it has descended to the Mostyns from their ancestor, Ievan Vychan, (a descendant of Tudor Trevor, Earl of Hereford,) who obtained it by marriage, in the reign of Richard I., with Angharad, heiress of Howel ab Tudor ab Ithel Vychan, of Mostyn, who derived his descent from Edwyn, lord of Tegengle, or Englefield. The mansion is situated in a small but beautifully undulating park, clothed in various parts with fine oaks and magnificent beeches, and was formerly approached by a venerable avenue. It is an ancient irregular edifice, erected at successive periods, and devoid of architectural character: the oldest portion of it was built probably so early as the reign of Henry VI., but the greater part of the present house was erected in 1631. The various apartments contain numerous good paintings and portraits, the latter chiefly of members of the family, and are likewise adorned with antique busts: the library, together with a valuable collection of books and manuscripts (the latter mostly on vellum, and many of them richly illuminated), contains numerous elegant Roman antiques, and other rare relics of former ages, among which are, the cake of copper found at Caerhên, in Carnarvonshire; the silver harp which Queen Elizabeth gave to Thomas Mostyn, in 1568, to bestow upon the most skilful bard at the Eisteddvod held at Caerwys, in the above year; and the golden torques found near Harlech castle, in 1692. In this house Henry Earl of Richmond was concealed, whilst planning the overthrow of the house of York, and the place of his retreat having been discovered by Richard III., a party of armed men was despatched to apprehend him; but Richmond contrived to escape through a hole in the back part of the house, which is still called "the king's," and was afterwards joined at the battle of Bosworth Field by Richard ab Howel, then lord of Mostyn, to whom, after the victory, he presented, in token of gratitude for his preservation, the belt and sword he wore on that day, which were kept for ages in the mansion. In the parliamentary war, this house was garrisoned by Sir Roger Mostyn, who also repaired the castle of Flint, and raised an army of fifteen hundred men at his own charge, in support of the cause of his royal master. Downing, in the township of Edenowain, is the birthplace, and was the residence, of the distinguished antiquary and naturalist, Thomas Pennant, Esq., and is now the property of his son and successor, David Pennant, Esq. It is a good mansion in the form of the Roman letter H, with the wings terminating in gables, and is seated on the slope of a narrow valley, well sheltered by the finely wooded grounds which surround it: its name is a corruption of that of the township. The present house was built in 1627, and, together with the grounds, received great improvement from the late owner, of literary celebrity, who conducted the extensive walks, with the greatest taste and judgment, through the deep and darkly wooded dingles to the more elevated points, commanding noble views of the æstuaries of the Dee and the Mersey, and of the distant hills of Westmorland and Cumberland: these varied walks exceed three miles in length. The library, a room forty feet in length, built in the year 1814, contains a valuable and extensive collection of books and papers, among which are great numbers of valuable manuscripts, drawings, &c. In the different rooms are numerous pictures, consisting chiefly of subjects in natural history, and of family portraits; and there is likewise a cabinet of fossils and minerals. In the grounds, which contain several oaks of great age and girth, of which the most remarkable is called "the Fairy Oak," there is a deserted water-mill, skilfully altered by the late proprietor, so as to exhibit the appearance of a monastic ruin. Bychton, an old house built in 1572, situated in an adjacent township of the same name, was the original seat of the Pennants, who had been settled here ever since the tenth century, and a younger branch of which family removed to Downing early in the seventeenth century, on his marriage with the heiress of that house, whose descendant bequeathed it to David, the father of Thomas Pennant, Esq. Downing Ucha, a respectable mansion, is the seat of H. D. Griffiths, Esq.; and Mertyn is that of George Watkin Kenrick, Esq.

The soil of the lower parts of the parish is stiff and clayey; that of the upper, thin, light, and dry, resting on limestone, with occasional beds of gravel. The minerals consist of valuable beds of coal, limestone, and petrosilex, or chert, and of rich and extensive veins of lead-ore and calamine: some copper-ore and, not uncommonly, black jack, or sulphate of zinc, have also been found. The parish comprises a large portion of the extensive coal tract of North Wales, the richness of the strata in this part of which will be best shown by a notice of those through which a pit has been sunk at Bychton, to a depth of six hundred and fourteen feet: the total number of strata here composing the measures is twenty-seven, of which the following are of coal, viz.—the fourth, which is of the peculiarly inflammable species called "cannel coal," found also at Mostyn, and is three feet thick, and rests on a bed of common coal, six feet thick, making a total of nine feet; the sixth, which is two feet three inches thick; the eighth, fifteen feet; the tenth, nine feet; the twelfth, cannel coal, fourteen inches; the fourteenth, common coal, one foot; the sixteenth, six feet; the nineteenth, seven feet; the twenty-first, three feet;

the twenty-second, three feet nine inches; and the twenty-fifth and twenty-seventh, each also of the same thickness; making in all sixty-four feet eight inches of coal, and being equal to about one foot of coal in every nine feet depth. The thickest seam in the parish is found at Mostyn, and is sixteen feet thick: the dip of the strata varies from one yard in four to two in three. The coal mines of Mostyn and Bychton have been worked for a very great length of time, having been discovered in the reign of Edward I., by whom they were granted to the abbot and convent of Basingwerk. Throughout the seventeenth century, Dublin and the eastern coast of Ireland were supplied with coal from the Mostyn colliery; but since the year 1710, the accumulation of sand upon this coast was so great as to prevent vessels even of sixty tons' burden coming within two miles of the shore, until the recent formation of a channel and basin by the late Sir Thomas Mostyn; in addition to which the increased operation of the mines at Whitehaven and Workington, in Cumberland, has withdrawn the export trade from this place. The Mostyn collieries only are now worked, and produce about three hundred tons daily, the coal being chiefly sent coastwise to the more distant parts of North Wales. Here are nine separate beds of coal, varying in thickness from three-quarters of a yard to upwards of five yards, the latter being two hundred and ten yards below the sea, and worked for nearly a mile under it: a large steam-engine has been erected upon the sands, which raises the water from the mines: five hundred workmen are constantly employed in these collieries, and a more extensive scale of operations is now contemplated.

Mines of lead and calamine have also been worked in the hilly part of the parish, from time immemorial, until within the last few years, when the latter were discontinued, owing to the low price which the article bore in the market. The Llanerch y Mor reverberating furnaces, for smelting and refining lead-ore, were erected in 1750, on the site of some very ancient lead-works: they smelted sixty tons of ore per week, exclusively for the Manchester market, and afford employment to fifty workmen. Several years ago, copper-ore was obtained to a limited extent; but, though diligent search has been made, none has since been found. Beds of sandstone and freestone exist in the lower parts of the parish, and in the higher are strata of limestone and petrosilex: a great quantity of the last has been conveyed of late years into Staffordshire, where it is made into a coarse stone ware, or formed into stones for grinding and pulverizing burnt flints. The cliffs in the township of Mostyn present a singular appearance, being vitrified throughout their whole extent, as if emitted in a melted state from a volcano. This phenomenon is ascribed to the conflagration of some pyritical matter, which has destroyed the appearance of the regular strata of shale and sandstone, and converted the substance into an unbroken semi-vitrified mass, partially porous, but of the hardness of flint, and in some places of a beautiful vermilion colour, but in most of a mottled red and blue. This transformation is not confined to the face of the cliff, but extends generally through the rock, though diminishing gradually toward the interior, which, at some distance from the side, appears only discoloured. In forming a new line of road, a perpendicular face of rock has been laid bare to a considerable extent, and appears more compact than near the surface. The same cause extended its operations under the sea, entirely consuming the coal throughout its progress; and the miners are now employed in penetrating through this indurated substance, at the depth of forty-eight feet beneath the bed of the Dee. The rock is procured in large masses, to form breakwaters, and to repair the roads, for which it is peculiarly adapted by its extreme durability. The mineral productions of this district are shipped at Mostyn quay, where a pier and suitable warehouses, wharfs, and basins have been constructed: steam-packets, for the conveyance of passengers, sail from this place to Liverpool regularly, by which, and the frequent trading vessels, an uninterrupted intercourse is maintained with that port.

The living is a discharged vicarage, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese, of St. Asaph, endowed with one-fourth part of the corn tithes, and one-fourth of the small tithes throughout the parish, rated in the king's books at £9. 11. 5½, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph, who also presents to the sinecure rectory, which is rated at £28. 17. 6., but produces a disproportionate income, on account of the tithes being assigned on lease: it is comprised within the rural deanery of Tegengle. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, and situated in the township of Tre Lan, is a spacious unadorned edifice, consisting of a nave, chancel, and north aisle, with a large square western tower: the aisle was built by one Bleddyn Drow, of the house of Mostyn, to which family it belongs. Under a niche in the south wall there is a small elegant monument, by Westmacott, to the memory of the late celebrated Thomas Pennant, Esq., who died at Downing, on December 16th, 1798, aged seventy-three, and was interred here: it consists of an upright pillar of white marble, bearing on its front a medallion profile of the deceased, and surmounted by a Grecian vase: at the base kneels the Genius of Cambria, lamenting the loss of her able and ingenious tourist. There are two places of worship each for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, and one for Baptists. A school-room was built in the village, in 1740, by Mr. Pierce Jones, who bestowed it on the inhabitants, directing them to appoint a master, who, for the use of the school-room, was to teach gratuitously six poor children to read: to this number fourteen more were added by Mrs. Mary Bradshaw, in 1745, who gave for their instruction £140, now in the possession of the Mostyn family, and producing an annual interest of £5. 11., for which, however, only eight boys are taught. Mr. John Davies also, by will dated Oct. 10th, 1802, bequeathed £300 for the education of nine more boys, so that there are now twenty-three children upon the foundation, who are taught reading, writing, and arithmetic. Twenty poor persons of this parish receive five shillings quarterly from the interest of legacies bequeathed by Mrs. Sarah Pennant, and by Louis Gold, the faithful servant of Thomas Pennant, Esq.: the same number of the aged indigent are annually clothed out of the rental of lands in the parish of St. Asaph, purchased under the will of Mr. William Pennant, at the beginning of the seventeenth century; and children and others are also supplied with stockings, blankets, and other warm clothing. Twelve persons annually receive certain articles of clothing from the rental of a farm called Pant, in this parish, the joint property of Richard Garnons and David Pennant, Esqrs.

There are various relics of antiquity within the parish, the most interesting of which is Maen Achwynvan, or "the stone of lamentation:" it is an elegant antique cross, situated on the plain near the hill of Garreg, adjoining Pen yr Allt, and is composed of an entire stone, twelve feet high from the ground, two feet four inches in breadth at the bottom, and ten inches in thickness, with a circular top, containing on each side the figure of a Greek cross, in alto relievo. About the middle of the pillar, on the east side, is a St. Andrew's cross, beneath which is carved the rude naked figure of a man, holding in his right hand a staff, or spear, and near that, on the next side, is the representation of some animal. The other parts of the pillar, on every side, are chequered with fret-work, or adorned with various wreathings, or knots, and running foliage, in high relief, and of exquisite workmanship: the base is fixed in a pedestal buried beneath the surface of the ground. At what time or for what purpose this monument was erected, is a matter of uncertainty. Mr. Pennant considers it to have been a sacred pillar, before which penances were concluded by weeping and such like signs of contrition, and instances the weeping cross near Stafford; whilst Bishop Gibson, in his annotations on Camden, mentions a supposition that it had been set up as a memorial of some great battle fought on the spot, and notices the existence of numerous large tumuli in the parish, some of which, on being opened, were found to contain funereal urns of baked clay, celts, and arrow heads made of flint. On the summit of Garreg, the loftiest eminence in the parish, are the remains of a circular tower, hitherto considered to have been a Roman pharos, or lighthouse, erected to guide mariners along the æstuary of the Dee: it is built of rude limestone, imbedded in hard mortar, and is twelve feet six inches in diameter within the walls, which are four feet four inches in thickness, and of considerable height: to the basement story there are two entrances, exactly opposite each other, and over each is a square funnel, resembling a chimney, which opens on the outside, about half-way up the building: above this story appear to have been two floors. A few feet from the ground are three circular openings through the wall. A staircase within led to an upper story, in the walls of which were eight small square holes, cased with freestone, and separated by wooden panels: within these partitions were placed the lights: the building was surrounded by an intrenchment, and approached by a raised road, which may still be traced. The summit of this hill commands a varied and extensive prospect, including a view of Snowdon, the promontory of Llandudno, part of the Isle of Anglesey, and the bay of Llandulas, together with the æstuaries of the Dee and the Mersey, and, occasionally, the fells of Cumberland and Westmorland, and the Isle of Man. Clawdd Offa, or Offa's Dyke, passes through the western part of the parish, and in some parts can be traced only with considerable difficulty. It enters from the parish of Caerwys, and passes on the west of Llŷn Helyg, and through the plantations of Pen y Gelli, where it is quite perfect, and ten feet high; it then crosses the fields to Green Lane, where it is connected with a very large carnedd, and thence, proceeding to Newmarket gate, it continues on the right of the turnpike road to Trê Abbot, where it crosses the road, and is found nearly perfect on the left, there forming the boundary between Whitford and Llanasaph, and afterwards between the latter parish and Newmarket: it then recrosses the road at Marian, and, passing on the east of Newmarket, separates the parishes of Llanasaph and Gwaenyscor, and terminates on the shore near Talacre, though previous writers have fixed its termination at Tryddin, in the parish of Mold. Near Orsedd, in the township of Edenowain, stood Castell Tŷ Maen, one of the seats of Ednowain Bendew, or "Owen the Strong-headed," lord of Tegengle in the eleventh century, and one of the fifteen tribes of North Wales: there are no remains of this extensive pile, except the lofty mound on which it stood, now covered with a thriving plantation. The township of Trê Abbot owes its name to its having been the summer residence of the abbots of Basingwerk, to the society of which place Edward I. made considerable grants of lands and mines in this parish, including the woody tract called Gelli, which has for ages been stripped of its sylvan features, the monks having received permission from that monarch to cut down the wood: the name Gelli is now confined to a farm-house, which has been formed out of a chapel belonging to the abbots. Trê Abbot subsequently became the property of the family of Davies, one of the members of which, named Miles Davies, distinguished himself as the author of "Athenæ Britannicæ," &c., and as a poet of some note. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £1008. 2.

WHITTON, a parish in the hundred of KEVENLEECE, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (W. N. W.) from Presteign, containing 131 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the river Lug, is partly hilly and partly flat: the soil is light, and the inhabitants are principally employed in agriculture, in which they pursue the same improved system that is practised in the adjoining county of Hereford. The surrounding scenery, though not strikingly varied, is in general pleasing, and ornamented in some parts with patches of wood. The village is situated in a long and narrow valley, and has an air of pleasing seclusion and retirement. The petty sessions for the hundred are held here occasionally. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4. 7. 11., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. David, is a small ancient edifice, with a low tower: it consists only of a nave and chancel, and is not distinguished by any architectural details of importance. A school was founded in this parish, by Dame Child of Pilleth, who endowed it with lands now producing £100 per annum, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children of both parishes, and for apprenticing one child from each parish, to which latter purpose the sum of sixteen guineas from the endowment is annually appropriated. A Sunday school is supported by the minister's wife. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £110. 15.

WICK, a parish in the hundred of OGMORE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (W. S. W.) from Cowbridge, containing 349 inhabitants. This parish is situated near the coast of the Bristol channel. The living is consolidated with the vicarage of St. Bride's Major, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf. The church, dedicated to St. James, is not remarkable for any architectural details. There are places of worship for Unitarian Baptists and Calvinistic Methodists. A school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children is supported by subscription. Anthony Patch bequeathed £5, Thomas Williams a small rent-charge, and two unknown benefactors the respective sums of £14 and £10, for the relief of the poor. Near the church are the ruins of an extensive building, covered with ivy: by some it is supposed to have been a religious house, though there is no record of any establishment of the kind; by others it is thought to have been one of the ancient halls so frequently met with in this county, in which the lords marcher held their courts, and which were subsequently converted into schools and almshouses, and were generally known by the appellation of "church houses." The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £116. 12.

WIGVAIR (GWÎG VAIR), a joint township with Meriadog, in that part of the parish of ST. ASAPH which is in the hundred of ISDULAS, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (S.) from St. Asaph. The population is returned with the parish. This township is situated on the left bank of the Elwy, and contains a beautiful and romantic dingle, near that river, in which there is a fine spring, called Y Fynnon Vair, or "the Well of Our Lady," discharging about one hundred gallons of water per minute, and strongly impregnated with lime. It is enclosed in a polygonal basin, richly sculptured, which was formerly covered by a canopy supported by ornamental pillars, and was then numerous resorted to as a cold bath. Adjoining the well are the ruins of a cruciform chapel, in the decorated English style, the fine remains of the windows and other parts being overgrown with ivy. Prior to the Reformation this was a chapel of ease to St. Asaph, and was served by one of the vicars of that church. The river Elwy, the banks of which are finely wooded, is here crossed by a majestic bridge, called Pont yr allt Gôch, of one arch, eighty-five feet in span. Wigvair was formerly assessed in conjunction with the township of Meriadog for the separate support of their poor, but it is now included in the general assessment of the parish for that purpose.

WILLIAMSTON, a chapelry in the parish of BEGELY, hundred of NARBERTH, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (N. W.) from Tenby, containing 470 inhabitants. It is situated on the high road between Pembroke and Carmarthen. Coal is obtained here. The chapel is a rude edifice without tower or spire. This place is separately assessed for the support of its poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £50. 19.

WILLINGTON, a township in the parish of HANMER, hundred of MAELOR, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (N. N. E.) from Ellesmere, containing 388 inhabitants. It is situated on the high road from Whitchurch to Wrexham, and contains a few respectable residences, among which is Willington Hall. Some small bequests have been made for the instruction of poor children. The poor are maintained by a separate assessment, the average annual expenditure amounting to £270. 6.

WISTON, or WIZTON, a borough and parish, in the hundred of DUNGLEDDY, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (E. N. E.) from Haverfordwest, 15 (N. by E.) from Pembroke, and 259½ (W.) from London, containing 745 inhabitants. This place, of which the Welsh name is Castell Gwys, derived that appellation from its earliest Norman or Flemish possessor, Gwys or Wiz, who constituted it the head of his barony of Daugleddau: the daughter of his grandson, Sir Philip Gwys, married Gwrgan ab Bleddyn, a native chieftain, from whom descended the family of the Wogans, in whose possession this place remained till the present generation, when, in default of male issue, the ample estates of this ancient family were divided among the coheireses; and the castle and borough of Wiston were subsequently purchased by Earl Cawdor, the present proprietor. The ancient castle, founded by the original Norman proprietor, and a place of great strength, was frequently connected with the military events of which the ancient province of Pembroke was so often the scene, in the continual conflicts between the Welsh and the Norman invaders of their country. In 1146, the three sons of Gruffydd ab Rhÿs, joined by Hywel ab Owain Gwynedd, having assaulted this fortress with stones thrown by machines invented for that purpose, and with battering rams, succeeded, after an obstinate defence, in gaining possession of it. In 1193 it was attacked by Hywel ab Rhÿs, who took Philip de Gwys and his wife prisoners, and carried them off; and in 1220, Llewelyn, Prince of North Wales, in resentment of the violation of a treaty by which the settlers in this part of the country had sworn allegiance to him, attacked the castle, which he razed to the ground, and put the garrison to the sword. From this time the fortress never recovered its former strength, which became unnecessary, as the Welsh, after the marriage of their countryman, Gwrgan, with the daughter of Philip de Gwys, appear to have left this chieftain and his family in the undisturbed possession of it, as part of their estates.

The parish lies only a short distance to the north of the main road from Narberth to Haverfordwest: the church can only be approached by very bad roads, which, in unfavourable weather, are even dangerous. It is of very considerable extent, but the land is generally poor, the only portion of tolerably good soil being about six hundred acres near the church. The houses are scattered throughout the parish, scarcely any where forming a group: a few in the vicinity of the church approach nearest to the character of a village; and one of these is the old manor-house of the Wogans, a part of which, and the only part now occupied, is inhabited as a farm-house. A market formerly held here has long been discontinued; but an annual fair is still held on October 20th. This place appears to be a borough by prescription, for no vestige or notice of any charter is now preserved. A mayor is still elected annually, being presented by the jury of the court leet of the manor and borough, which must consist of burgesses and suitors of the manor; but he is usually some poor man who is made mayor, as a method of conferring relief, he being entitled to the tolls of the fair, amounting to £8, £10, or £12, per annum. For a year after the mayor has vacated his office he bears the title of alderman, and there is a tradition that the borough had once a more permanently constituted aldermanic body. There is still a town-clerk. The burgesses are presented by the jury of the court leet, which is held once or twice a year, and in which the only business connected with the borough consists in the appointment and swearing in of the mayor, burgesses, and constables: the burgesses are at present five or six hundred in number, of whom from two to three hundred are resident in the borough, or within seven miles of its limits. The constables act only for the parish of Wiston, which circumstance tends to show that the borough is co-extensive with its limits, that being the more general opinion, though some consider that the borough is co-extensive with the manor, which not only comprehends the whole parish, but extends a distance of two miles and a half to the north, and a quarter of a mile to the south, of its boundary. Wiston has heretofore been contributory with Pembroke and Tenby, in the return of a parliamentary representative, the right of election being vested in all the burgesses, resident and non-resident, in whom it was confirmed by a resolution of the House of Commons, in 1712. Under the recent act to amend the representation it remains, with unaltered limits, a member of the same district of boroughs, to which Milford is now added; but the right of election has been restricted to the resident portion of the burgesses, and extended to the £10 householders, duly registered: the number of qualifying tenements is fifty-eight, but of these only eight are of the value of £10 per annum, exclusively of the land held with them.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Earl Cawdor. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a plain Norman edifice, with a small tower, and, from its retired situation in the bosom of a plantation, by which it is partly concealed, has a pleasing and picturesque appearance. There is a place of worship for Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. A school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children, in which at present there are about forty of both sexes, is supported by Earl Cawdor and the other proprietors of land in the parish. The remains of the ancient castle, occupying an elevated site, are but very inconsiderable, consisting chiefly of a portion of the keep, crowning the summit of a conical hill, surrounded by a deep moat. From the appearance of the site it seems to have been originally of very great extent, and, from the thickness of the walls in some parts of the family mansion of the Wogans, which, according to tradition, formed a part of the ancient fortress, it must have been a place of great strength. This ancient mansion is at present let to a farmer, who, however, occupies only part of it: from its windows, and from the ruined keep of the castle are obtained prospects of remarkable extent and beauty. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £249. 8.

WOLSTON, or WESTON-NY-END, a chapelry in that part of the parish of WORTHEN which is in the lower division of the hundred of CAWRSE, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, containing 165 inhabitants. This place is sometimes also called Stony-end, from its comprising a long and not very productive eminence, on the border of Shropshire. It is composed of the two townships of Trelystan and Rhôsgôch. The chapel, which is situated at Trelystan, is dependent on the mother church of Worthen.

WOMASTON, a joint township with Walton, in the parish of OLD RADNOR, and within the liberties of the borough of NEW RADNOR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (E.) from New Radnor, containing, with Walton, 186 inhabitants. It is situated in a fertile district on the banks of the little river Somergil. Womaston, the seat of S. Lewis, Esq., is a good house, occupying a pleasant situation. This township is separately assessed with Walton for the support of its poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £140. 3.

WORTHENBURY, a parish in the hundred of MAELOR, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 7 miles (E. S. E.) from Wrexham, containing 623 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the banks of the river Dee, and on the road from Wrexham to Malpas, in the county of Chester, is entirely agricultural, and principally divided between the proprietors of the estates of Emral and Broughton, which constitute nearly the whole of the parish. Emral is at present the seat of Sir Richard Puleston, Bart., whose ancestors, originally of Norman descent, have resided here in uninterrupted succession since the reign of Edward I. The first of the family who settled at this place was Sir Roger de Puleston, a great favourite of that monarch, who, after his conquest of Wales, appointed him collector of the taxes which he had imposed on the Welsh, for carrying on the war against France, and also made him sheriff and keeper of the county of Anglesey for life. The Welsh, exasperated by the levying of taxes which they had not previously been accustomed to pay, seized Sir Roger, at Carnarvon, and hanged him on the spot. Edward, incensed at the violence committed on his lieutenant, severely punished the insurgents, and also appointed his son Richard de Puleston sheriff of the county; and in the second parliament to which the shire and the borough, after the incorporation of the latter, returned members, the former elected John and the latter Robert de Puleston for their representatives, as if to atone to the descendants for the outrage committed upon their ancestor. Sir Richard Puleston, Bart., the present proprietor of Emral, had the honour, in 1806, of introducing into Wales His late Majesty George IV., when Prince; in commemoration of which event His Royal Highness was pleased to signify his approbation that Sir Richard, as a testimony of his regard and esteem, should bear, as a crest, an oak tree, with an escutcheon pendant therefrom, charged with three ostrich feathers within a coronet. Broughton, the seat of Mr. Allanson, is also a spacious mansion, to which are attached extensive grounds, and is likewise an ancient family residence. The soil of the higher grounds is in general good loamy clay, producing superior crops of wheat and rich pasturage; that in the lower grounds, which is subject to partial floods from the river and some tributary brooks which intersect it, is formed of alluvial earth. The river Dee forms the boundary of part of the parish on the north-west, where it also separates the counties of Denbigh and Flint.

This parish was formerly a chapelry in that of Bangor Iscoed, from which it was severed under the provisions of an act of parliament for uniting and dividing parishes, in 1658: the living was, however, taken possession of by Dr. Bridgeman, rector of Bangor, in 1661, but was ultimately again separated, and Worthenbury was made a distinct parish, by an act of parliament obtained in the 2nd of William and Mary. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £19. 13. 4., and in the patronage of Sir Richard Puleston, Bart. The tithes of the parish formerly belonged to the family of Puleston, subject to a small annual payment to the rector of Bangor. Judge Puleston, being desirous of establishing a resident minister at this place, erected a good house near the church, in 1657, and endowed the living with £100 per annum, upon condition that his chaplain, Philip Henry, who had entered his family as tutor to his children, in 1653, would undertake the cure of souls in this place, which offer being accepted, Mr. Henry resided in the house, and performed the duties of the incumbency till the year 1661, when he was suspended from his charge for non-conformity, and in the following year quitted the parish. During the insurrection of the inhabitants of the county of Chester, in 1659, some of Lambert's forces came to this church, to attend the ministry of that celebrated preacher. The church, dedicated to St. Deiniol, is a handsome modern edifice of brick, with a lofty tower ornamented on the summit with urns and crosses alternately. Thomas Puleston, Esq., bequeathed £150 in money for building a school-house in the churchyard, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children, and for six small houses to be let rent-free to poor decayed tenants on the Emral estate. Sir John Puleston, of Emral, was chamberlain of North Wales in 1554; and John Puleston, one of the judges of the Court of Common Pleas, was born at Emral. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £339.

WREXHAM, a market town and a parish, chiefly in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, but partly in that of MAELOR, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 24 miles (S.E. by E.) from Denbigh, 16 (E.S.E.) from Ruthin, and 187½ (N.W.) from London, comprising the chapelries of Bersham Drelin-court and Minera, and the townships of Abenbury-Vawr, Abenbury-Vechan, Acton, Bieston, Borrashovah, Broughton, Brymbo, Esclusham Above, Esclusham Below, Gourton, Stansty, Wrexham Abbot, and Wrexham Regis, each of which maintains its poor separately, according to an arrangement made in March 1830, and containing 11,515 inhabitants, of which number, 2043 are in the township of Wrexham Abbot, and 3441 in that of Wrexham Regis, these two comprising the town. This place, which is of very remote antiquity, is noticed in the Saxon Chronicle under the names of Wrightesham and Wrightesham, from which its present appellation is most probably derived. From its situation on the eastern side of Clawdd Offa, or Offa's Dyke, it was enumerated among the towns of the Saxon kingdom of Mercia, but was, at a subsequent period, included in the district called Welsh

Maelor. Edward I. granted this town, together with the lordship of Bromfield and Yale, within which it was included, to John Earl Warren; but scarcely any thing of historical importance appears ever to have distinguished it. In the reign of Henry VIII. it was noticed by Leland as a trading town, having some merchants and good buckler makers. During the civil war in the reign of Charles I., the church was converted into a temporary prison. No remarkable event, however, took place here during that war, except that in March, 1646, some of the parliamentary soldiers mutinied for their pay, seized Colonel Jones, the treasurer, and others of the parliamentary commissioners, and compelled Colonel Mytton, who had just entered the town, to make a hasty retreat to Holt Castle.

The town is pleasantly and advantageously situated at the junction of the Shrewsbury, Welshpool, Oswestry, and Chester roads, at the distance of little more than eleven miles from the latter place, and in the centre of the mining and manufacturing districts of the eastern part of Denbighshire: it consists of several spacious streets intersecting each other at right angles, the houses in which are in general neatly and substantially built: it is well paved and lighted with gas, and the inhabitants are plentifully supplied with water. A small theatre is occasionally opened for dramatic performances; and races are annually held early in October, on a course a little to the north-west of the town, on the right of the road to Mold. No particular branch of trade or manufacture is carried on in the town; but the parish, which is about twelve miles in length, and two and a half in breadth, abounds with mineral wealth, and extensive works of various kinds are carried on in different parts of it. In the township of Esclusham Below are some paper-mills on a large scale, situated on the banks of the river Clywedog. In that of Minera there are extensive lead mines and collieries: the working of the former is almost suspended, owing to the great influx of water, notwithstanding the united power of several steam-engines, which are employed to draw it from the mines: the coal-works are conducted upon a large scale, the Vale of Clwyd being principally supplied from this source; and there are other collieries at Esclusham above Dyke, at Broughton, and in the township of Brymbo, in which last place are also iron-works, established by the late John Wilkinson, Esq. The coal mines generally vary from one hundred to one hundred and twenty yards in depth, and in some parts they are sunk to the depth of two hundred yards: the strata of coal vary from eighteen inches to fifteen feet in thickness. The iron-stone of this district is found in detached nodules, in beds intermediate with and below the coal strata, and is of the usual kind of argillaceous ore, containing from thirty to thirty-five per cent. of metal: it is often smelted with a small portion of the richer hæmatitic ore from Ulverstone, which is brought hither for that purpose, and is thought to improve its quality, being much prized for its peculiar tenacity. A foundry for cannon was established at Bersham by the late John and William Wilkinson, Esqrs., from which not only our own Government, but some of the continental states, particularly Russia, were formerly supplied; but these works are now in ruins, the only tenable part having been converted into a corn-mill. The iron-works in this parish have indeed been long in a neglected state, appearing to have been superseded by those in the adjoining parishes of Ruabon and Gresford, though it is in contemplation to revive those at Brymbo; and, as the ores both of lead and iron are rich and abundant, the works may again be brought into active operation, whenever a sufficient improvement in trade demands it. When the Ellesmere canal was projected, it was in contemplation to construct a branch from Pont y Cyssyltau to Chester, through Broughton, Brymbo, &c.; but the plan was abandoned, owing to the want of water sufficient for a high level, and other circumstances: the only mode of conveyance is by land carriage to Chester. Markets are held on Monday and Thursday, the latter being the principal market day. Fairs are held annually on the Thursday after the second Wednesday in January, March 23rd, Holy Thursday, June 16th, Thursday after the second Wednesday in August, September 19th, third Thursday in October, and Thursday after the second Wednesday in December. The March fair is the greatest in North Wales: it commences on the 23rd, and lasts fourteen days; and, for the accommodation of the various dealers attending it, five extensive areas are fitted up with shops and booths: one of these commercial halls confers twenty-eight votes for the county upon its proprietors, who are principally inhabitants of Huddersfield. This fair is attended not only by the inhabitants of the neighbouring district, but by tradesmen from distant parts of the kingdom: the chief commodities brought to it by the Welsh are, flannels of various qualities, linsey woolseys, coarse linens, horses, cattle, and sheep: the dealers who attend it from distant places expose for sale Irish linens, Yorkshire and other woollen cloths, and every variety of Birmingham, Sheffield, and Manchester manufactures, with which the greater part of North Wales was formerly supplied hence for the remainder of the year. By the recent act to amend the representation Wrexham has been made contributory with Denbigh, Holt, and Ruthin, in the return of a parliamentary representative: the borough is made to consist of the two townships of Wrexham Abbot and Wrexham Regis, together with a very small detached portion of that of Esclusham Below, situated within the town. The elective franchise is vested in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of ten pounds and upwards, provided he be capable of registering as the act directs; the present number is three hundred and thirty-one. It has also been made one of the polling-places in the election of knights for the shire. The town is under the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, who hold petty sessions in it every month. The town-hall is a large brick edifice, situated at the top of High-street; the ground floor was formerly open, but is now enclosed between the pillars that support the upper story: this consists of a spacious and lofty room, formerly a court of justice, but now only used for public meetings, and as a dépôt for arms. A county house of correction, situated here, comprises seven wards for the classification of prisoners, who are allowed a portion of their earnings.

The living is a vicarage, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese, of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £19. 9. 9½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Giles, is a spacious and venerable edifice, in the later style of English architecture, deservedly regarded as one of the finest ecclesiastical edifices in the principality. The steeple of the original church was blown down in 1331; and in 1457 the church was burnt. In order to promote the rebuilding of it, an indulgence of forty days, to be continued for five years, was granted to every one who contributed to that work, and the present structure was erected, about the year 1472, the glass used in the windows having been brought from Normandy: the tower was not finished till about the year 1506, as appears by a date on the building. No fewer than one thousand five hundred and fifty sittings have recently been added, of which nine hundred are free, the Incorporated Society for building and enlarging churches and chapels having contributed the sum of £200 towards that purpose. The exterior of the building is embellished with grotesque sculpture; and the tower, which is very lofty and highly enriched, consists of several successive stages, panelled throughout, and decorated with numerous statues of saints, among which is that of its patron, St. Giles, in canopied niches, elaborately wrought: from the loftiness of its elevation and the light open-work turrets by which it is crowned at the angles, it forms a conspicuous and highly interesting object, as seen from every part of the surrounding country. The interior consists of a nave, chancel, and north and south aisles: the nave is separated from the aisles by columns and pointed arches, and is lighted by a fine range of clerestory windows: the roof is of carved oak richly ornamented, and supported by springers resting on embellished corbels. The chancel is separated from the nave by a curiously wrought iron railing, and is octangular at the east end: the altar-piece is injudiciously embellished with rich columns of the Corinthian order, and in the centre is a painting of the Last Supper, presented to the church by Elihu Yale, of Plâs Gronow, who also presented a painting of David playing on the harp, which is placed in another part of the church: the roof of the chancel appears to be of more ancient date than those of the nave and aisles, and on one side are three stone stalls elaborately sculptured. The fine brazen eagle, formerly used as a reading-desk, and presented to the parish by John ab Gruffydd ab Davydd, of Ystiva, in 1524, is still preserved in the church, and is used by the clerk during the reading of the communion service. Among the most ancient of the monuments is that of a knight in complete armour: at the feet is a dog, and beyond it a dragon, with the point of the tail terminating in a serpent's head: on the shield is a lion rampant, and around it an inscription, of which only the words "Hic jacet" are legible. In the chancel there is an altar-tomb, on which is a recumbent effigy of Dr. Bellot, successively Bishop of Bangor and Chester, in his episcopal robes: he died at Bersham, in this parish, in 1596: his funeral was celebrated at Chester, but his body, according to his particular request, was interred in the parish where he died. Nearly opposite to this tomb is an exquisite and highly interesting monument, by Roubilliac, to the memory of Mrs. Mary Myddelton, of Chirk Castle, in which she is represented rising from the tomb in all the freshness of youth and beauty: above is a shattered pyramid, with a cypress tree, and near it an angel with a trumpet. At the corner of the aisle there is a monument, also by Roubilliac, to the Rev. Thomas Myddelton and Arabella his wife: their profiles are finely executed on medallions, with a curtain, partly drawn aside, the drapery of which is exquisitely sculptured. There are also several monuments of very good design and elaborate execution, to William Lloyd, Esq., and his son; to the Fitzhughs, the Pulestons, the Longuevilles, and others. In the churchyard is the tomb of Elihu Yale, who was governor of Madras, and whose singular epitaph represents him as born in America, bred in Europe, to have travelled through Africa, and to have been married in Asia. There are also other tombs deserving of notice, one of which, bearing a curious epitaph, records the interment of Daniel Jones, parish clerk of Wrexham, who died in 1668. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Welsh and Wesleyan Methodists, and Presbyterians, and a Roman Catholic chapel, within the parish.

The free grammar school was founded by Valentine Broughton, alderman of Chester, who endowed it with £18 per annum, for which twelve boys are gratuitously taught. Dame Dorothy Jeffreys, in 1728, by will reciting that her late daughter Margaret, in 1711, had bequeathed £100 to the poor of the parish, and £20 for the teaching of poor children, in addition to those bequests, left £400, to be laid out in lands or on other good security, and the interest to be appropriated to the instruction and apprenticing of poor children of the parish. This property was invested by the vicar and churchwardens, who were appointed trustees, in the purchase of an estate, for which they gave the sum of £822. 7., and which now produces an income of £163 per annum, of which £60 per annum are paid to the master of Dame Jeffreys' school, for which a commodious building was erected by Sir W. W. Wynn, Bart., in 1809; £62 per annum to the mistress of the National school for girls, erected at Pen y Bryn by subscription, in 1819; £35 per annum is distributed among the poor of the parish; and the remainder is reserved for contingencies. From 1815 till 1826 the sum of £62 per annum was paid to the master of the free grammar school, but since that time it has been applied as above described. Attached to Bersham chapel is a free school for girls, fully noticed in the article on that place. From the rental of the above estate a certain sum was applied to defray the expense of erecting the house and premises now occupied by the master of the free grammar school. There are also considerable funds, arising from divers bequests and donations, for distribution by the vicar and churchwardens among the poor of the parish. Offa's Dyke is traced in various parts of the parish, and is plainly visible in the township of Esclusham, which, in reference to it, is divided into Esclusham above Dyke and Esclusham below Dyke: it also passes through the township of Broughton, and, in every part of the parish in which it is traced, is in a very perfect state, but particularly in the grounds of Pentre Bychan and Plâs Power. Wat's Dyke passes along the western boundary of the town of Wrexham, and, taking a northerly course, is continued through the township of Stansty to the river

Alyn, near which it enters Llai, in the parish of Gresford. The remains of two Roman baths were discovered in the town, in the year 1806. In the neighbourhood are numerous gentlemen's seats, for which, even in the time of Churchyard, the poet, the vicinity was peculiarly distinguished. Among those in the more immediate neighbourhood are, Pentre Bychan, the seat of H. W. Meredith, Esq.; Plâs Power, that of Thomas Fitzhugh, Esq.; Acton Park, formerly the seat of the family of Jeffreys, and the birthplace of the notorious judge of that name, and now the property and residence of Sir Foster Cunliffe, Bart., a spacious mansion delightfully situated in extensive grounds richly diversified with picturesque and romantic scenery, and commanding pleasing views over the town and the adjacent country, which abounds with features of beauty and interest; Erddig, that of Simon Yorke, Esq., the romantic hanging woods in the domain of which are deservedly the theme of general admiration; Cevn, late the residence of George Kenyon, Esq., deceased; Brymbo Hall, the seat of William Legh, Esq., a fine specimen of domestic architecture, said to have been built from a design by Inigo Jones, and commanding the most extensive prospect in the neighbourhood; and several others in the adjoining parishes, in the accounts of which they are respectively noticed. In this parish also are the remains of many old mansions, which are now occupied only as farm-houses. Amongst these are, Cadwgan; Hâvod y Wern, formerly the residence of the Puleston family; and Esclusham Hall, also a residence of that family. Mr. Edward Randles, organist at Wrexham towards the close of the last and early in the present century, although blind, was one of the most skilful performers on the harp in the kingdom; and his daughter, Miss Elizabeth Randles, was an unexampled prodigy of juvenile proficiency in the art of music; having had the honour, when only three years and a half old, of performing on the piano-forte before the king and the royal family.

Y.

YERBESTON, a parish in the hundred of NARBERTH, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (S.W.) from Narberth, containing 155 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated near the turnpike road leading from Pembroke to Narberth, comprises but a small extent of land, which is all enclosed and cultivated. Culm is found in some parts of it, but is worked only for home consumption, and the supply of the immediate neighbourhood. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5. 3. 9., endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Baron de Rutzen. The church, dedicated to St. Lawrence, is not distinguished by any architectural details of importance. A school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children is supported at the sole expense of the present incumbent. The average annual expenditure for the relief of the poor is £36. 13.

YN DRE ISA (YN-Y-DRE-ISÂV), a township in that part of the parish of LLANBADARN -VAWR which is in the lower division of the hundred of GENEU 'R

GLYN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 1 mile (E. S. E.) from Aberystwith, containing 335 inhabitants. The parochial church of Llanbadarn-Vawr, and the greater part of the adjacent village are situated in this township, a small part of which is included within the new boundaries of the contributory borough of Aberystwith. It is bounded on the north-west by the river Rheidol. The poor are supported by a separate assessment, the average annual expenditure amounting to £51. 14.

YN DRE UCHA (YN-Y-DRE-UCHÂV), a township in that part of the parish of LLANBADARN-VAWR which is in the lower division of the hundred of GENEU'R GLYN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $1\frac{3}{4}$  mile (E. by S.) from Aberystwith, containing 347 inhabitants. It is bounded on the south by the river Rheidol, and contains a portion of the village of Llanbadarn-Vawr. There is a separate assessment for the support of the poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £77. 19.

YNIS Y MOND (YNYS-Y-MWNT), a hamlet in the parish of CADOXTON, hundred of NEATH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, containing 177 inhabitants. It is situated in that part of the Vale of Neath which comprises the upper portion of the parish, and near to the head of the Neath canal. There are several small coal-works at present in operation, but the number of persons employed is uncertain, depending upon the fluctuating demand for their produce.

YNYSAWDRE (YNYS-Y-NAWDD-DRÊV), a hamlet in the parish of ST. BRIDE'S MAJOR, hundred of OGMORE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, containing 91 inhabitants. It is situated at the mouth of the Ewenny and Ogmere rivers, which here unite their waters and flow into the Bristol channel; and it takes its name, signifying "the Isle of Refuge, or Sanctuary," from a small island in the æstuary formed by these streams. The greater portion of the inhabitants are employed in fishing. A separate assessment is made for the relief of its poor, the average annual expenditure amounting only to £6. 4.

YNYSCYNHAIARN (YNYS-CYNHAIARN), a parish, comprising the town of Trêmadoc (which is described under its own head), in the hundred of EIVION-YDD, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, and containing 1075 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from its low maritime situation, and the dedication of its church to St. Cynhaiarn, who flourished about the close of the sixth century, is situated on the Traeth Mawr, and on the turnpike road from Pwllheli to Trêmadoc. The surface is very uneven, and in some parts mountainous; and the soil varies exceedingly, but in the lower grounds is fertile. In the mountainous parts copper-ore is found in various places, but none of the mines are worked with spirit or success. The living is annexed to the rectory of Criccieth, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor. The church is now being rebuilt upon a more commodious site, in the later style of English architecture, and, when completed, will be a very handsome structure: the churchyard has been very considerably enlarged, a measure rendered absolutely necessary from the increase of population which has taken place since the formation of the town and port of Trêmadoc. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The poor children of this parish are entitled to the benefit of gratuitous instruction in the school at Criccieth. The average annual expenditure for the relief of the poor of the whole parish amounts to £329. 7.

YR-DDREINIOG, a township in that part of the parish of TRÊGAYAN which is in the hundred of TYN-DAETHWY, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES. The population is included in the return for the parish. The name signifies a place abounding with thorns.

YSCEIBION, a joint township with Bachymbyd, in that part of the parish of LLANYNYS which is in the hundred of ISALED, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (N. W. by W.) from Ruthin. The population is included in the return for the parish. A large portion of this township was enclosed in 1803, under the provisions of an act of parliament.

YSCEIVIOG (YSGEIVIOG), a parish in the Caerwys division of the hundred of RHUDDLAN, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. W. by S.) from Holywell, containing 1852 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the roads from Denbigh to Mold and Holywell, comprises a very considerable tract of good arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and cultivated, and a portion of hilly ground, which is too elevated for culture. A waste tract of three thousand five hundred acres in it and the adjacent parishes of Nannerch and Whitford was enclosed some years ago by act of parliament. The village, which is small, is seated on an eminence, commanding some finely varied and extensive prospects; and the surrounding scenery presents many interesting features. Lead-ore abounds in the parish, and several mines, which had been worked for many years with great advantage, have been recently discontinued, in consequence of the present low price of the metal. The living consists of a rectory and vicarage united, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese, of St. Asaph: the rectory is rated in the king's books at £18. 10. 10., and the vicarage, which is discharged, at £6. 3. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ .; the patron is the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is an ancient and spacious edifice, partly Norman, and partly in the early style of English architecture, with a massive and lofty tower of very rude construction: it consists of a nave and chancel, with a large chapel or chantry on each side of the latter, lighted by ranges of lancet-shaped windows: on the north side of the nave there is a very elegant Norman doorway, now walled up, the mouldings of which are richly ornamented and in an excellent state of preservation; but the body of the edifice is in such a state of dilapidation, that divine service has been discontinued, and is to be in future performed in the National school-room. There are two places of worship each for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, and one for Baptists. A National school was erected by subscription, aided by a grant from the parent society in London, and for some time the school was conducted with success, but, from the want of an endowment for a master, it has been discontinued: at present about twenty boys are gratuitously instructed at the expense of the rector and two other gentlemen of the parish. There are several charitable donations and bequests by various benefactors, the produce of which is annually distributed among the poor. On the high ground in this parish are the remains of a Roman encampment; and at Brŷn Sion was found, in the year 1816, a very beautiful torques of pure gold, measuring fifty-two inches in length, and weighing twenty-four ounces, which was purchased by the present Marquis of Westminster, for three hundred guineas, and is now in the cabinet at Eaton Hall. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £802. 3.

YSCIR-VAWR (ESGAIR-VAWR), a hamlet in the parish and hundred of MERTHYR-CYNOG, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (N. N. W.) from Brecknock, containing 204 inhabitants. The parish church is situated in this hamlet, which comprises the vale through which the larger branch of the Yscir stream flows. The population is exclusively agricultural, and the right of common on the surrounding bleak and extensive mountains is in general use. There is a small bequest producing £2 per annum for the relief of the poor, left by Edward Gwynn, in 1760. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £129. 18.

YSCIR-VECHAN (ESGAIR-VECHAN), a hamlet in the parish and hundred of MERTHYR-CYNOG, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (N. W. by N.) from Brecknock, containing 243 inhabitants. The lesser branch of the Yscir, from which the hamlet takes its name, flows through a vale here, and the surrounding country is composed of barren and mountainous commons. The poor are maintained by a separate assessment, the annual expenditure averaging £110. 19.

YSGWYDDGWYN (YSGWYDDWYN), a hamlet in the parish of GELLYGAER, hundred of CAERPHILLY, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (S. E.) from Merthyr-Tydvil, containing 105 inhabitants, which is also the exact number returned in 1821. It is situated on the right bank of the river Romney, near its source, and forms the upper portion of the parish, where the ground is bleak and mountainous, the inhabitants thinly scattered, and the right of common generally exercised. There is a meeting-house for a congregation of dissenters.

YSPYTTY-IVAN (YSPITTY-IEUAN), a parish, composed of the townships of Tir-Evan and Trebrys, in the hundred of ISALED, county of DENBIGH, and the township of Eidda, which separately maintains its own poor, and is partly in the above-named hundred and county, and partly in the hundred of NANTCONWAY, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (S. W.) from Pentre Voelas, and containing 847 inhabitants. This parish, which is intersected by the river Conway, a few miles below its source, derives its name from a preceptory belonging to the knights of St. John of Jerusalem, founded by Ivan ab Rhŷs, about the year 1189, which continued to flourish until the suppression of that order, affording a sanctuary to travellers and others during the period of the conflicts between the English and the Welsh: this privilege continuing with the lords of the manor, after the abolition, and the place being exempted from all civil jurisdiction, rendered it an asylum for robbers and other malefactors, who became the pest of the surrounding country, until the reign of Henry VII., when they were extirpated by the courage and firmness of Meredydd ab Ievan: the site of the hospital, or preceptory, is now occupied by the parish church, and there is not a single vestige of the buildings. Fairs are held on March 17th, May 21st, July 3rd, September 27th, October 2nd, and December 2nd. A manorial court is held periodically. The living is a perpetual curacy, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese, of St. Asaph, endowed with a rent-charge of ten guineas private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is a small neat edifice: it contains three alabaster figures in a tolerable state of preservation, though much neglected: the first is that of Rhŷs Vawr ab Meredydd, to whom Henry Earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII., entrusted the standard of England, at the decisive battle of Bosworth Field, after Sir William Brandon, his former standard-bearer, had been slain: the second is that of his wife Lowry; and the third, in canonical robes, represents his son Robert ab Rhŷs, cross-bearer and chaplain to Cardinal Wolsey. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Captain Richard Vaughan, in the year 1700, gave the sum of £200, which was subsequently vested in land, and Catherine Vaughan gave £14 per annum, for the benefit of the poor: from these funds an almshouse for six poor persons was built, which is still in existence, but the endowment has not for many years been appropriated according to the intentions of the donors. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor of the whole parish amounts to £354. 4., of which sum £155. 12., are assessed on that part of it which is in Denbighshire.

YSPYTTY YSTRAD MEURIC, a parochial chapelry, in the parish of YSPYTTY YSTWTH, upper division of the hundred of ILAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 13 miles (S. E.) from Aberystwith, containing 109 inhabitants. This place formerly belonged to the abbey of Strata Florida, about three miles distant, an hospitium or cell to which was situated here; and from this circumstance, probably, and from its situation near the river Meuric, is derived its name. It is of very limited extent; but is much distinguished in history for its ancient castle, of the original foundation of which nothing satisfactory is known: the first notice of it occurs in the history of the siege of Aberystwith castle by Gruffydd ab Rhŷs, when the governor of that fortress sent to Ystrad Meuric by night, and received before the morning a reinforcement which enabled him to defend it against the attacks of the Welsh prince. It was partly destroyed by Owain Gwynedd, in 1136, when that chieftain, aided by his brother Cadwaladr, destroyed several other castles in Wales, which were held by the Anglo-Norman invaders. It was, however, repaired in 1150, by Rhŷs, Prince of South Wales, who, with his brother Meredydd, sons of Gruffydd ab Rhŷs, took it from Hywel ab Owain Gwynedd, and fortified it for themselves. In 1158, it was besieged and taken by Roger Earl of Clare, but was retaken, in 1189, by Maelgwyn ab Rhŷs, who, in 1194, gave it to Anarawd his brother, as a ransom for the liberation of his two brothers Hywel and Madoc, whom that chieftain had made prisoners. It did not remain long in the possession of Anarawd, for, in 1198, Maelgwyn again retook it, and retained it till the year 1207, when, despairing of being able to defend it against Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, Prince of North Wales, from whom he expected a hostile attack, he razed it to the ground, and from that time it does not appear that it was ever rebuilt. The surrounding country is composed chiefly of elevated and barren hills. The turnpike road from Aberystwith to Trêgaron passes through this place, and an annual fair is held on the 2nd of July for pigs, wool, and pedlery. The chapel, which has no separate endowment, is served by the incumbent of Ysptyty Ystwith, or his curate. It is dedicated to St. John the Baptist, and is a small plain building, consisting only of a nave. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. A free grammar school was founded here by the Rev. Edward Richards, who endowed it for thirty-two boys from any part of the country, preference being given to those of this parish and neighbourhood. The grammar school of Llanvihangel-Lledrod, an adjoining parish, of which Mr. Richards was master, and which was endowed for forty boys of the upper division of that parish, was, after his decease, united to the school of this place; and this institution has long been eminently distinguished as one of the best classical schools in the principality. A very handsome school-house has been recently erected, in the later style of English architecture, to which is attached an excellent library, comprising a valuable collection of books in various languages. It is conducted by a head master and second master, and is visited by the Bishop of St. David's, and John P. A. Lloyd Philipps, Esq., of Dale Castle, in the county of Pembroke: the endowment amounts to about £100 per annum. There is an exhibition to St. John's College, Cambridge, belonging to this school, for the best Greek scholar. Among the eminent persons who have been successively masters may be noticed Mr. Edward Richards, the Rev. John Williams, who conducted it for forty years, and the Rev. D. Williams, late fellow of Wadham College, Oxford, an eminent divine and critic, who distinguished himself as an impartial magistrate, an elegant scholar, and a polished gentleman. There are some remains of the ancient castle of Ystrad Meuric, occupying the summit of a gravelly hill near the village, which, though inconsiderable, denote it to have been originally a place of great strength and importance. On one of the hills in this parish, called Friwllwyd, are the remains of a Roman intrenchment, occupying a commanding site to the north of the church; and on another hill, called Tommen Vilwyn, there is a cairn of considerable extent. An ancient house called Mynachtŷ is supposed to have been the hospitium from which the parish most probably derived its name. Edward Richards, founder of the grammar school, was a native of this parish: he was distinguished as a profound scholar and critic, an antiquary, and a Welsh poet, and was the author of some pastorals, which, for elegance of composition and purity of style, are unrivalled by any writings in the Welsh language: he is supposed to have been born in the year 1714, but his name does not appear in the parish register. The average annual expenditure for the relief of the poor is £19. 3.

YSPYTTY-YSTWITH, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of ILAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 13 miles (S. E. by E.) from Aberystwith, containing 472 inhabitants. The name is derived from an ancient hospitium formerly existing here, which is supposed to have belonged to the Knights Hospitallers, and its adjunct from its situation on the banks of the river Ystwith. The parish, which is also bounded on the east by the small rivers Marchnad and Meuric, comprises about four thousand acres, one-half of which is waste land. The surface is hilly, and the soil various: in the lower grounds, which in some parts are subject to partial inundation, it is boggy, and in the higher rocky and barren: there is some good arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and cultivated. Lead-ore is found in the parish, of which some mines have been worked with advantage, and are still carried on. Fairs are held annually at the hamlet of Rhôs, in this parish, on the first Thursday after Whit-Sunday, August 5th and 26th, and September 25th. Part of the parish is within the post-office delivery of Lampeter, from which it is sixteen miles and a half distant. The living is a perpetual curacy, with that of Ysptyty Ystrad Meuric annexed, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Earl of Lisburne. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is a small ancient edifice, consisting only of a nave, divided by a screen to form a chancel: the roof is supported by octagonal pillars, in one of which there is a cavity for the purpose of a font: it is situated on a rock commanding a fine view of Maen Arthur wood. Poor children of this parish have the privilege of gratuitous instruction in the free grammar school at Ystrad Meuric. The average annual expenditure for the relief of the poor is £31. 14.

YSTRAD, a joint township with Argoed, in the parish of TRÊGARON, upper division of the hundred of PENARTH, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES. The population is included in the return for Argoed.

YSTRAD, a joint township with Garth, in the parish of LLANDEWY-BREVI, upper division of the hundred of PENARTH, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (N. E.) from Lampeter. The population is returned with the township of Garth. It is situated on the right bank of the Teivy, and the old Roman road from Llanio to Pennal passed through it, from which latter circumstance its name is supposed to be derived.

YSTRAD, a hamlet in that part of the parish of LLANDINGAT which is in the lower division of the hundred of CAYO, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 2¼ miles (S. W. by W.) from Llandovery, containing 223 inhabitants. It occupies part of the right bank of the Towy, and the road from Llandovery to Carmarthen passes through it. Near this road stands Llwyn Brân, the beautiful seat of Major Rice, situated within view of the Towy, and sheltered by luxuriant plantations behind. There is a ford across the river in this hamlet, the population of which is almost exclusively agricultural.

YSTRAD (MIDDLE), a hamlet in the parish of YSTRADDYVODOG, hundred of MISKIN, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, containing 220 inhabitants.

YSTRADDYVODOG, otherwise YSTRADDYVODWG, (YSTRAD-DYVODWG), a parish, divided for the maintenance of its poor into the two hamlets of Ystraddyvodog and Rhigos, in the hundred of MISKIN, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (N. W. by N.) from Llantrissant, containing 1047 inhabitants. The scenery in this neighbourhood is singularly wild and romantic: the mountains, which are very lofty, frequently rise abruptly, and almost perpendicularly, from the level ground, and present an unbroken face to the summit, so as to have obtained the designation of the "Alps of Glamorgan." The roads are very indifferent, and frequently prevent tourists from penetrating into these secluded and romantic scenes. The Dinas collieries are situated in the vicinity, whence a communication is formed by tram-roads with the Glamorganshire canal. This parish is within the jurisdiction of the court of requests held at Merthyr-Tydvil, on the second Thursday in every month, pursuant to an act passed in 1809, for the recovery of debts not exceeding £5. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Llantrissant, to whom the vicarial tithes of the parish are appropriated. The church is dedicated to St. Tyvodwg, and is situated in a valley of the same name, nearly in the centre of the parish. There is a place of worship for Baptists. The average annual expenditure of the whole parish, for the support of the poor, amounts to £383. 18., of which sum, £279. 18. are assessed upon the hamlet of Ystraddyvodog.

YSTRADDYVODOG HORNE, a hamlet in the parish of YSTRADDYVODOG, hundred of MISKIN, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, containing, with Clydach, 322 inhabitants.

YSTRADGUNLAIS (YSTRAD-GYNLAIS), a parish, comprising the Upper and Lower divisions, each of which separately maintains its own poor, in the hundred of DEVYNOK, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 14 miles (N. E. by E.) from Swansea, and containing 2078 inhabitants, of which number, 438 are in the Upper, and 1640 in the Lower, division. The name of this place, according to some authorities, is derived from the dedication of its church to St. Gunleus, a prince of "Glewissig," who, by his residence here, gave his name to the small vale in which it is situated. But others more correctly state that the church is dedicated to St. Mary; and it has been thought that the proper name of the parish is Ystrad-Gurlais, or Garwlais, signifying "the vale of the rough-sounding brook," and is derived from a stream so called, a little below the church, which separates this parish from that of Kilybebill, and also forms a boundary between the counties of Brecknock and Glamorgan. The parish is situated in the Vale of Tawe, and is bounded on the south-east by the river of that name, and on the south-west by the brook Garwlais above noticed, and is intersected by the turnpike road from Swansea to Brecknock. Its surface is adorned with several gentlemen's seats, the principal of which, Yniscedwin House, anciently the seat of the Aubreys, and now the property of the Rev. Fleming Gough, by marriage of one of his ancestors with the heiress of that ancient family, is a handsome mansion, situated in a delightful part of the Vale of Tawe, environed by some richly varied scenery, and in the centre of a highly improvable and extensive domain. In the upper division of the parish, which belongs almost exclusively to Walter Price, Esq., of Glynllêch Uchâv, stands the ancient seat of Glynllêch Isâv, the property of — Powel, Esq. The entire district abounds with mineral wealth, and in the parish are valuable mines of iron-ore, stone coal, and limestone, which, combining with other local advantages, have led to the establishment of very extensive works at this place. The iron-works belonging to the Yniscedwin Iron Company are considered as among the oldest of the kind now in operation in the kingdom; and the opinion of their antiquity has been confirmed by the discovery of an old pig of iron, found in a cinder bank in 1795, on which was the date 1612. These extensive works comprise two blast furnaces for smelting the ore, air furnaces and cupolas for converting the pig iron into castings, with fineries for making the refined metal used by the tin-manufacturers. The furnaces are blown by a powerful machine, erected in 1828, from designs by Mr. Brunton, of London, and worked by a water-wheel of large diameter. The iron-ore and limestone used in the works are procured in the parish; but the stone coal being unfit for the purpose of smelting iron, a supply of other coal is obtained from mines in some of the adjoining parishes. The works, when in full operation, afford employment to five or six hundred men, exclusively of whom, about two hundred and sixty men are constantly employed in the collieries in this parish: the stone coal and culm raised in these is chiefly used in drying malt and burning lime. Great quantities of limestone are quarried at the Cribarth rock, and are purchased by farmers and others along the line of the Swansea canal, to burn for manure and other purposes. On the limestone to the north of this rock is found an abundance of tripoli, or lapis cariosus, of a very pure quality, much of which is collected and conveyed by the canal to Swansea, and thence shipped to different parts of England, to be used in the burnishing of metals. The Swansea canal, a branch of which extends to the Yniscedwin works, terminates at a place called Hên Noyadd, in this parish, two miles above the church; and to it converge numerous tram-roads from the works, for the conveyance of their produce. A tram-road was laid down, in 1825, by John Christie, Esq., of London, extending from the Gwain Clawdd, over the forest of Devynock, to Rhôd y briw, in the Vale of Usk, by means of which a communication is established between this mineral district and the heart of Brecknockshire. It is also in contemplation to construct a branch road, six miles in length, from Pen-wyll to the head of the Swansea canal, forming a junction with the main road, which is at present the property of — Clayton, Esq., banker, of Boston, in Lincolnshire.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £9. 10. 7½., and in the patronage of the Rev. Fleming Gough, as proprietor of the Yniscedwin estate. The church is a small neat fabric, consisting simply of a nave and chancel, with a belfry at the west end. The chapel of Coelbren, situated in the upper division of the parish, and formerly a chapel of ease to the mother church, has been endowed, and the living is now a perpetual curacy, the advowson of which was granted in perpetuity to the College of St. David's, at Lampeter, by the Rev. Fleming Gough, at the period of the foundation of that institution. The chapel was rebuilt in 1799, almost entirely at the expense of Walter Price, Esq., of Glynllŷch, who owns five of the seven tenements of which the hamlet of Coelbren consists. There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents: that for the latter is a remarkably neat building at Tŷ'n Coed, in the upper division of the parish, erected by voluntary contributions, in 1831: that for the Baptists is situated at Nant y fin. Sunday schools are supported by the members of the established church and those of the different dissenting congregations. Morgan Aubrey, of Yniscedwin, Esq., bequeathed a rent-charge of £5, payable out of a farm called Twyn y Ceiliog, in the parish of Devynock, for the benefit of the poor of this parish. A Roman road, now called the Sarn Lleon, or Sarn Helen, is still visible in this parish, passing along a high ridge of rock which separates it from the parish of Ystradvelltey, and from that of Cadoxton in the county of Glamorgan, and hence declining southward towards the Roman station Nidum (Neath). On this ridge, between Coelbren and Cevn hir vynydd, there was formerly an erect stone, supposed to have been a Roman milliary, with an inscription, of which only the letters IMP C were in later times legible, but it has been removed or destroyed. Upon the hills towards Llywel, and bordering on Carmarthenshire, are several carneddau, and the remains of three ancient British encampments, but nothing has been recorded of their original formation. Near the chapel of Coelbren there is an encampment, which, from its quadrilateral form, and its contiguity to the Sarn Helen, is thought to be of Roman origin; and at a short distance from this place there is a kind of natural wall, formed by the side of the limestone rocks, in which is a small cavern, called Cradock's Church, or Hermitage, which, according to Mr. Jones, the historian of Brecknockshire, is erroneously so called, as he supposes it to have been the cell in which Gunleus died in the arms of his son Cattwg, who gave his name to this cavern, as his father had in like manner given his to the vale. About three-quarters of a mile to the east of Coelbren chapel is the most remarkable waterfall in this part of the county, called 'Sgwd yr hên rhyd: it is formed by the Llŷch, or Llŷchog, a small mountain stream, which, for a considerable distance from its source, flows over a rocky bed, in a part of its course entirely destitute of vegetation, and without any feature of beauty, except where in some places it expands into a considerable river: it afterwards crosses the road from Ystradvelltey to Coelbren, when it is lost in a deep wooded glen, on its emerging from which the whole river, in one unbroken sheet, descends from a perpendicular height of more than a hundred feet; being interrupted in its fall by a projecting ledge of rocks, about ten or twelve feet below the summit, it dashes into foam, and, after its descent for the remaining ninety feet, without further impediment, it disappears in the thick foliage of the woods which clothe its precipitous banks, and pursues a winding course to the river Tawe. Though this fall is of much greater height than that of Eiro Hepstè, the water in its descend has less grandeur and breadth, when both rivers are equally full. At an inn, known by the sign of the "Lamb and Flag," in this parish, the outlawed criminal Hatfield, who, under the assumed name of the Hon. Colonel Hope, seduced into marriage the beautiful and artless Mary of Buttermere, was arrested: he was committed by the magistrates to the gaol at Brecknock, and thence conveyed to Carlisle, where he was tried and executed. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor of the entire parish amounts to £279. 15., of which sum, £141. 2. are defrayed by the Upper, and £138. 13. by the Lower, division.

YSTRAD-MEURIC, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES.—See YSPYTTY YSTRAD MEURIC.

YSTRAD-OWEN, or YSTRAD-OWAIN, a parish in the hundred of COWBRIDGE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (N. E.) from Cowbridge, containing 233 inhabitants. Ithel, surnamed Dû, or "the Black," Prince of Glamorgan in the tenth century, occasionally resided here; and this place is distinguished in the historical annals of the principality as the scene of a desperate battle between the invading Saxons and the ancient Britons under Conan ab Sytsylt, in the year 1031, in which that chieftain and all his sons were slain. It derives its name from Owain ab Collwyn, who resided here in a palace, of which the site is marked by a large tumulus near the church, now covered with a thriving plantation. The parish comprises a moderate extent of good arable and pasture land, and a portion of common, affording pasturage for sheep and young cattle. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, and enlivened with some interesting features. Ash Hall, late the residence of Colonel Aubrey, and now the property and residence of William Wood, Esq., is a handsome modernized mansion, pleasantly situated on an eminence above the church, commanding a fine view of the whole vale of Glamorgan, from the house to the sea, with the town of Cowbridge in the foreground, and the high lands of Somersetshire in the distance. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, endowed with £1200 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Chancellor of Llandaf. The church, dedicated to St. Owain, is a very small ancient edifice, not remarkable for any architectural details. On a tablet is an inscription recording that Sir L. Jenkins, Knt., gave to the churches and parishes of Ystrad Owen and Llanblithian the tenor bell; and that Evan Jenkins, his brother, gave thirteen acres of land, to repair the said bells, directing the surplus to be appropriated in apprenticing poor children of both parishes, in equal shares. On a hill to the south of the church there are some inconsiderable remains of the ancient castle of Tâl y vaen, or Talavan, one of the twelve fortresses erected by the followers of Fitz-Hamon, by whom this portion of the conquered territory was granted to Sir Richard de Seward, in whose family it continued for many generations: it formed part of the dowry of the widow of Hugh le Despencer, when affianced to Guy de Brien, and was subsequently conveyed by marriage to the Dukes of Lancaster, and still forms part of the duchy. In a field near the village were two large monumental stones, rudely ornamented, which were supposed to have been placed at the head of the graves of Owain ab Ithel and his consort, and thence called the King and Queen stones; but they have been removed for some time. Near the churchyard, in a field adjoining it on the west, there is a very large tumulus, of which not even any traditionary account has been preserved. An annual assembly of the bards was held here for many years, under the auspices of the ancient family of Hensol, and the meetings were continued till the year 1721, when the male line of that house became extinct: a house in which these meetings are said to have taken place is still remaining. The average annual expenditure for the relief of the poor amounts to £124. 4.

YSTRADVELLTHEY (YSTRAD - VELLTAU), a parish, composed of the Lower and Upper divisions, in the hundred of DEVYNOK, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 15 miles (S.W.) from Brecknock, containing 747 inhabitants, of whom, 434 are in the Lower, and 313 in the Upper, division. This parish is beautifully situated in the sequestered vale of the Mellte, from which it takes its name, and on the turnpike road from Brecknock, through Pont-Neath-Vaughan, to Neath and Swansea. It is chiefly remarkable for the romantic beauty of its scenery, and the numerous and highly interesting objects of natural grandeur which it comprehends within its comparatively narrow limits. On the confines of the county of Glamorgan, but within this parish, is the small but picturesque village of Pont-Neath-Vaughan, situated on the Lesser Neath river, over which there is a neat stone bridge, connecting the counties of Brecknock and Glamorgan. At this village, which may be regarded as the head of this district, fairs were formerly held on the first Saturday after the 12th of March, the Saturday before the 5th of July, the Saturday before the 26th of August, September 21st, and November 14th; but now only two are held there, one on the 12th of May, and the other on the 14th of November, for cattle. At Craig y Ddinas, in this parish, and in its immediate vicinity, is found an abundance of fire clay of the very best quality, some of which is conveyed down the Neath canal, which penetrates as high as Aber Gwrylych, in this vicinity, to be used in the furnaces near the town of Neath, and for exportation. The living is consolidated with that of Devynock, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a small ancient edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, with a square tower, and is situated in the centre of the village, which is very small. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. David Gwalter, of Maes Gwalter, in the parish of Devynock, charged the tenements of Vyle and Heol vawr, in this parish, with the annual payment of £5 each, one for apprenticing a poor child of this parish annually, and the other for the instruction of ten poor children, five of this parish, and five of that of Penderin. Morgan Llewelyn, in 1630, bequeathed three tenements, called respectively Tŷr pen y Graig, Tŷr pwll y Gelynen, and Tŷr yr Ynysvor, the two former in this parish, and the latter in the parish of Vainor, the rents of which he appropriated for distribution among the poor. Sir Henry Williams, of Gwernyvet, Knight, in 1676, bequeathed a rent-charge of £1. 10.; Margaret Lewis, of Breton, in 1733, bequeathed a house and a smith's shop; and Griffith Morgan, of this parish, charged the tenement of Tŷr

Gorov Nedd with the annual payment of £3, for the benefit of the poor. The Sarn Lleon, or Sarn Helen, enters the parish at its north-eastern extremity, in a line parallel with the turnpike road from Brecknock, and, after intersecting the small vale of Mellte, again continues its course for nearly a mile and a half parallel with the turnpike road, after which, taking a west-north-westerly direction, it crosses Cwm Nedd Vychan towards Blaen Nedd. At a short distance from that place there is an old stone, on the edge of which is an inscription in Roman characters, very much defaced, of which only the words HIC IVCI are legible, and in which the first part of the letter H is wanting, and the A in the second word is reversed. Mr. King, in his Archaeologia, states that a gold coin of Vespasian had been found near this place. Close to the village there is an artificial mount, but nothing has been recorded either of its origin or history.

The river Mellte, in the summer, when the water is low, runs through a confined rocky channel, till it arrives nearly opposite the village, when it enters a small whirlpool on its southern bank, and disappears: its course for nearly half a mile is concealed by stones, till it reaches a cavern a little below Porth yr Ogov, or "the mouth of the Cave." This remarkable cavern is entered by a horizontal aperture, twenty feet high and about fifteen yards wide, leading into a spacious apartment with a vaulted roof, from which hang stalactites and other calcareous concretions, which, on the introduction of lights, exhibit brilliant and splendid reflections, of numberless hues: the floor is strewn with large masses of broken rock, scattered about in all directions, and in many parts presenting almost insurmountable obstacles to the progress of the visitor. Through this cavern the river Mellte pursues its course, rushing over the rocky fragments which obstruct its progress, and near the centre of it precipitates itself from a very considerable height into a deep abyss, where the roaring of the cataract and the darkness of the cavern tend to excite a sensation of awe. At the distance of a few hundred feet the river re-appears, and in time of floods bursts out with prodigious force, forming a series of cataracts of uncommon grandeur and unrivalled beauty. From a projecting cliff, on the eastern side of the vale, the river, just above its confluence with the Hepstê, rushes with violent impetuosity, and descends in one unbroken sheet, forming a magnificent cascade, of which the noise is tremendous; and such is the violence of its fall, that it loses every appearance of water, and assumes that of heavy spray and foam. From this point the river struggles through a deep channel, obstructed by projecting rocks on each side of its precipitous banks, diverting its current into a variety of fantastic directions, in a course of nearly three miles, till it falls into the river Neath, or Nedd Vechan. There are several other cataracts in the immediate vicinity, some of which are beautifully picturesque. Near the junction of the counties of Brecknock and Glamorgan there is a fine cascade, called Sêwd Einion Gam, formed by the Pyrdin, which, after emerging from a narrow glen, falls from a height of nearly eighty feet down an abrupt precipice, of which one side is richly clad with verdure, and with trees and shrubs which have taken root among the stratifications of the rock, and the other is naked, dreary, and rugged. At a small distance below the confluence of the Pyrdin with the Nedd Vechan there is a singularly picturesque fall, called "Ysgwd Gwladis:" though the breadth of the sheet of water, and the elevation from which it falls, are less than the others, the appearance of this cataract is infinitely more romantic, and the scenery around it more striking. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £292. 15.

Y VAENOR ISAV, a hamlet in the parish of CAYO, higher division of the hundred of CAYO, county of CAR-

MARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $8\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W.N.W.) from Llandovery. The population is included in the return for the parish. It is also called the Lower Hamlet, and is situated on the left bank of the Cothy stream. The road from Llandovery to Llansawel passes through it. At Maes Llan Wrthwl, in this hamlet, a severe battle is said to have been fought between the Romans and the Britons; and two ancient inscribed stones have been found in the vicinity, one of which denoted that an individual named Paulinus lay there interred.
